A foreign wine merchant carrying on business at Rheims employed agents in this country to canvass for orders to be forwarded to him for execution if he thought fit. Upon acceptance of the order the principal invoiced the goods in his name to the customer and delivered them on board at Rheims at the expense and risk of the customer. The amounts due were usually forwarded direct by the customer to the principal, but in some cases received by the agents.

Decision of the Court of Appeal, 43 W. R. 184, [1895] 1 Q. B. 71, reversed.

This was an appeal by Messrs. Grainger from an order of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.), reported 43 W. R. 184, [1895] 1 Q. B. 71, affirming an order of the Divisional Court (Mathew and Cave, JJ.), upon a special case stated under 43 & 44 Vict. c. 19, s. 59, by the Commissioners for the General Purposes of the Income Tax Acts for the City of London.

The facts are stated in the report below, and also sufficiently appear in the judgments.

Asquith, Q.C., and Pyke, Q.C. (R. M. Bray with them), for the appellants.—M. Roederer does not trade "within" the United Kingdom, though he trades "with" the United Kingdom. There is no contract made in England for delivery of this wine. It is delivered in France, and usually payment is made in France: Sulley v. Attorney-General, 8 W. R. 71, 5 H. & N. 711; Colquhoun v. Brooks, 38 W. R. 288, 14 App. Cas. 493. The appellants are not agents for the purpose of income tax assessment under section 41 of the Act of 1842. They could not know what the profits were, and have not the means of making a return. See sections 40 to 44 inclusive and section 51 of the Act of 1842, and the earlier Acts, 39 Geo. 3, c. 13; 43 Geo. 3, c. 122; and 46 Geo. 3, c. 65.

Sir R. B. Finlay, S.G., and Danckwerts, for the respondent (the Surveyor of Taxes).—The appellants carry on business in this country: Brampton v. Beddoes, 11 W. R. 268, 13 C. B. N. S. 538; Tischler v. Apthorpe, 33 W. R. 548, 52 L. T. N. S. 814; Pommery v. Apthorpe, 35 W. R. 307, 56 L. J. Q. B. 155; Werle v. Colquhoun, 36 W. R. 613, 20 Q. B. D. 753; Erichsen v. Last, 30 W. R. 301, 8 Q. B. D. 414. The appellants are agents, and assessable: Dowell's Income Tax Laws, p. 129; Gresham Life Assurance Society v. Styles, 41 W. R. 270, [1892] A. C. 309.

Asquith, Q.C., replied.

The House took time for consideration.

Lord HERSCHELL.—The appellants are wine merchants, carrying on business in the City of London. They act as agents in this country, for certain purposes which will require careful consideration, for Louis Roederer, a wine merchant, whose chief place of business is at Rheims, in the Republic of France. Two questions arise for determination—first, whether Roederer exercises any trade, employment, or vocation within the United Kingdom; and next, whether, if so, he is liable to be assessed to the income tax in the name of the appellants as being his agents within the meaning of section 41 of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35.

The first step to be taken is to ascertain with accuracy what are the facts in the present case. I say this because one of the learned judges in the Court of Appeal expressly relied on the fact that contracts were habitually made in this country by Roederer, and another member of the court seems to have regarded the finding in the case that "the appellants are agents in Great Britain for the sale of L. Roederer's wine" as involving a finding that sales by Roederer took place in this country. Standing by itself, the finding would probably have this meaning. But it does not stand alone. The whole of the facts found must be considered in conjunction with one another, as well those in the amended as in the original case. The nature of the appellants' agency is plain enough. They canvass for orders for Roederer's wine, and receive a commission on all orders from Great Britain, if executed. The functions of the sub-agents whom they appoint are the same. When orders are received they "are transmitted by the appellants to Louis Roederer at Rheims, and he exercises his discretion as to executing the said orders." This is the statement in the original case. In the amendment it is stated that "orders are sought by them as agents on behalf of Louis Roederer as their principal, that such orders are given by customers to Messrs. Grainger & Son and received by them, but the appellants allege that the said Louis Roederer, in his arrangement with them as his agents, has reserved a right to reject any particular order." The commissioners add that, in their opinion, this right is in fact intended to protect Roederer in cases where there is doubt as to the pecuniary position of the customer giving the order, and that no special notice is given to the customer of the right so reserved. The commissioners appended to the amended case certain documents produced by the appellants as specimens indicative of the manner and style of business transacted by them on behalf of Louis Roederer. One of them is an order addressed to the appellants. It commences, "Please ship per G. & J. Porter," and then specifies certain quantities and descriptions of Roederer's wine. The appellants in reply to this write: "In compliance with your obliging order of yesterday, we shall have much pleasure in requesting L. Roederer to ship for your account, through Messrs. G. & J. Porter, of Calais," the wine specified. Taking the findings together, I think it clear that no contracts to sell wine were ever made by the appellants on behalf of Roederer. All that they did was to transmit to him the orders received, and until he had agreed to comply or complied with them there was no contract. He was under no obligation to the persons giving the orders to the appellants to execute any one of them. I think the statement in the original case was, having regard to the documents, a perfectly correct one, and that it is not accurate to speak of Roederer's having reserved to himself a right to reject any particular order. An order given to a merchant for the supply of goods does not of itself create any obligation. Until something is done by the person receiving the order which amounts to an acceptance there is no contract. It is clear that the appellants in receiving an order did not accept or purport to accept it on Roederer's behalf so as to constitute a contract, and that they had no authority so to do. The learned Solicitor-General in his argument for the Crown did not contend that any contracts were made in this country by Roederer, either personally or through his agents; indeed, he admitted the contrary. Mr. Danckwerts did argue that there were such contracts. His argument was an ingenious one. He called attention to certain price lists which were distributed by the appellants amongst persons likely to give orders, and contended that as soon as an order was given to them by a person receiving one of those lists a contract to supply the specified quantity at the price named in the list was complete, subject only to a right on the part of Roederer to disavow it. I think it impossible to accede to this contention. In my opinion this would not be understood by anyone in the trade to be the effect of giving an order for goods specified in such a price list. The transmission of such a price list does not amount to an offer to supply an unlimited quantity of the wine described, at the price named, so that as soon as an order is given there is a binding contract to supply that quantity. If it were so, the merchant might find himself involved in any number of contractual obligations to supply wine of a particular description which he would be quite unable to carry out, his stock of wine of that description being necessarily limited. I entertain, I confess, a very clear opinion that the Solicitor-General was quite right in arguing the case on the assumption that no sales were made in this country. Taken in connection with the facts stated, I think the finding that the appellants "are agents in Great Britain for the sale" of Roederer's wine means no more than this—that they are engaged by him to canvass for custom, to seek to obtain from persons in this country orders for his wine.

The wine is sold to the customers as it lies in Rheims cellar or pris en cave. The customer pays the cost of packing and carriage from the cellars, and takes all risk. The delivery to the purchaser, therefore, takes place in France. The wine is invoiced to the purchaser in Roederer's name as vendor, the invoice being sent to the appellants, and by them transmitted to the purchaser.

The amounts due in respect of the wines sold are sometimes collected by the appellants on behalf of Roederer, and sometimes remitted direct to him. When the payments are made to the appellants in cash, or in cheques on London banks, cashed by them, the moneys so received are credited to Roederer against the amount of the commission due to them and charges incurred by them on his behalf.

Taking it to be the fact, as in my opinion it undoubtedly is, that contracts for the sale of wine are not made by Roederer in this country, and that the delivery by him to purchasers always takes place in France, it appears to me that the case differs widely from any that have hitherto been decided. In all previous cases contracts have been habitually made in this country. Indeed, this seems to have been regarded as the principal test whether trade was being carried on in this country. Thus in Erichsen v. Last the present Master of the Rolls said: "The only thing which we have to decide is whether, upon the facts of this case, this company carry on a profit-earning trade in this country. I should say that whenever profitable contracts are habitually made in England by or for foreigners with persons in England, because they are in England, to do something for or supply something to those persons, such foreigners are exercising a profitable trade in England, even though everything to be done by them in order to fulfil the contracts is done abroad."

All that the appellants have done in this country on behalf of Roederer has been to canvass for orders, to transmit to him those orders when obtained, and in some cases to receive payment on his behalf. Beyond this he has done nothing in this country, either personally or by agents. Does he, then, exercise his trade within the United Kingdom? It has been sometimes said that it is a question of fact whether a person so exercises his trade. In a sense this is true; but in order to determine the question in any particular case it is essential to form an idea of the elements which constitute the exercise of a trade within the meaning of the Act of Parliament. In the first place, I think there is a broad distinction between trading with a country and carrying on a trade within a country. Many merchants and manufacturers export their goods to all parts of the world, yet I do not suppose anyone would dream of saying that they exercise or carry on their trade in every country in which their goods find customers. When it is said, then, that in the present case England is the basis of the business, that the wine was to be consumed here, and that the business done would remain undone but for the existence of the customers in England, I cannot accept this as proof that Roederer carries on his trade in this country. It would equally prove that every merchant carries on business in every country to which his goods are exported. Moreover, the proposition would be just as true if English customers gave their orders personally at Rheims. Something more must be necessary in order to constitute the exercise of a trade within this country. How does a wine merchant exercise his trade? I take it, by making or buying wine and selling it again with a view to profit. If all that a merchant does in any particular country is to solicit orders, I do not think he can reasonably be said to exercise or carry on his trade in that country. What is done there is only ancillary to the exercise of his trade in the country where he buys or makes, stores, and sells his goods. Indeed, I do not think it was contended that the solicitation of custom in this country by a foreign merchant would in all cases amount to an exercise by him of his trade "within" this country. The learned counsel shrank from maintaining that if, for example, he sought custom only by sending circulars to persons residing here, or advertised in British newspapers, he could on that account be said, within the meaning of the statute, to be exercising his trade in this country. They relied on the circumstance that he had appointed agents in this country who regularly solicited and received orders and transmitted them to Roederer. If in each case the other circumstances are the same, the contract of sale being made abroad and the delivery taking place there, I find myself quite unable to see how the mode in which orders are solicited and obtained, whether by an agent or by circulars or advertisements, can make the difference and cause the trade in the one case to be exercised, and in the other not to be exercised, within this country. If the mere employment by a foreign merchant of an agent to solicit and to transmit orders does not amount to an exercise of his trade in this country, I do not think that it becomes an exercise of his trade here if, in addition, the agent in some cases receives the price of the goods sold for transmission to his principal; still less does it appear to me material that in the London Post Office Directory there was inserted by the authority and with the knowledge of Grainger & Son, "Roederer, Louis, Rheims, champagne merchants (Grainger & Son, agents, 21, Mincing-lane)."

For these reasons I have come to the conclusion that the taxing section does not apply in the present case. This view renders it unnecessary to decide the question whether the appellants are agents within the meaning of section 41 of 5 & 6 Vict. But I must say that, as at present advised, I cannot adopt the view that the words "having the receipt of any profits or gains" control the word "receiver" only, and not the words "factor" and "agent." The word "agent" obviously cannot extend to every agent for whatever purpose he may be employed, as, for example, to an advertising agent. This was felt by Cave, J., who said that it meant an agent "for the purpose of exercising the trade in question, if it was a trade." But if the word "agent" must be in some way controlled, why introduce words for the purpose, instead of treating it as controlled by the words which follow, and which may not only be made to control it without doing any violence to the language used, but seem to me to be naturally applicable to it, especially on a consideration of all the terms of the section? At the same time, I am not disposed to put so narrow a construction on the section as was contended for by the appellants. In the case of a trade exercised in this country, I think any agent who received for the foreigner exercising such trade moneys which included trade profit would be within the provisions of section 41.

It was said that if Mr. Roederer was not liable to income tax in this case, it would give foreigners an unfair advantage over British traders. This does not appear to me to be the case. I do not think such considerations can legitimately influence our decision; but if they are to be introduced, I think it would be much more prejudicial to British traders if we were to lay down that, though the sale and delivery of their goods takes place in this country only, they carry on business in every country from which they obtain orders for their goods through solicitation by an agent, or, indeed, in any other way; for I do not think it can logically or reasonably make any difference in principle what the method of soliciting custom may be.

I think the appeal should be allowed, with costs both here and in the court below.

Lord WATSON.—This appeal raises two questions upon the construction of the Income Tax Acts. Did Louis Roederer, who is a champagne merchant residing and carrying on business in France, during the years 1884, 1885, 1886, exercise his trade in this country, within the meaning of Schedule D of the Act of 1853? If so, did the appellants, Grainger & Son, act during that period as his agents, in such sense as to make them answerable, under section 41 of the Act of 1842, for doing everything necessary in order to the assessment and payment of duty upon the profits or gains arising from the exercise of his trade within the United Kingdom? The facts upon which the answers to be given to these questions depend have been stated by the Commissioners of Taxes for the City of London, in a special case which was amended by them upon a remit from the Queen's Bench Division.

Louis Roederer supplies large quantities of champagne from his cellars at Rheims to consumers in the United Kingdom. He has no place of business in this country, and keeps no stock of wine here, either by himself or by an agent. During the three years for which income tax is claimed his name was inserted in the London Post Office Directory, under the head "Trades," in these terms: "Roederer, Louis, Rheims, champagne merchant (Grainger &

Son, agents), 21, Mincing-lane, E.C.," that being the address of the appellants, who carried on business as wine merchants on their own account, and also acted, during the period in question, as his agents. Beyond receiving payment in cash or bills on account of Louis Roederer, as will be presently noticed, the appellants' agency was limited to soliciting orders for champagne, either by themselves or through sub-agents who were appointed by them. These orders, when received, were not accepted by the appellants, who had no authority to that effect, but were transmitted by them to Louis Roederer at Rheims, who invariably reserved the right to reject any order forwarded to him. The necessary result of that course of dealing was that until Roederer had accepted the order there was no contract which could bind him or afford a right of action against him to the person who gave it.

When an order was accepted, the wines were packed in Rheims at the expense of the customer, to whom they were then forwarded direct, at his cost and risk. An invoice was made out at Rheims, charging the price of the wine, according to current lists furnished to the customer by the appellants, together with expenses of packing, &c., which was sent to the appellants for transmission to the customer. Each invoice contained a slip, requesting those customers who preferred paying by bill or cheque on Paris to have these drafts made out to their own order, and then to indorse them to Louis Roederer, so as to enable him to identify each remittance with the customer who sent it.

The appellants were remunerated for these services by a commission upon the orders which they procured. In some cases customers of Louis Roederer made payment to them in cash; but the money thus received by them rarely exceeded the sum due to them as commission, and then only to a small amount. The appellants also received English and foreign drafts and cheques in favour of Louis Roederer, for which they gave acknowledgments to the customer. These drafts and cheques were forwarded by them to Louis Roederer, who then sent a receipt direct to the customer.

These facts appear to me to raise a question in regard to the nature of the trading connection between Louis Roederer and his customers in the United Kingdom which is not covered by any previous decision. In Tischler v. Apthorpe and in Pommery v. Apthorpe the foreign wine merchant traded in this country through an English agent, who sold his wine in England and received the price, making delivery to the buyer either from the stock which had been sent to him by his principal or by directing a consignment to be sent from Rheims. In Werle v. Colquhoun the decision of the Court of Appeal was based upon the express ground that the foreign wine merchant exercised his trade in England by making contracts there for the sale of his champagne through his English agent. Erichsen v. Last, although it did not relate to the wine trade, was a decision of the same class. The telegraph company whose profits were assessed to income tax had its principal seat of business in Copenhagen; but it had offices and agents in various parts of the United Kingdom, where its agents made contracts for the transmission of messages through its wires, and received payment for sending them. I agree with the opinion expressed in that case by the present Master of the Rolls, that whenever a foreigner, either by himself or through a representative in this country, "habitually does, and contracts to do, a thing capable of producing profit and for the purpose of producing profit, he carries on a trade or business"; and that the profits or gains arising from these transactions in the United Kingdom are liable to income tax.

There is, in my opinion, a very broad distinction between the case of a foreigner making contracts in England with his English customers for the sale of his wines, either personally or through a representative, and the case of his making similar contracts with these customers in his own country. In the present instance the orders forwarded to Louis Roederer were, in law, nothing more than offers to purchase until the contract between him and each offerer was completed by his acceptance at Rheims; and he fulfilled his part of the contract by making delivery of the wine sold to the purchaser, and at the purchaser's risk, in Rheims. The trade of Louis Roederer consists in the sales of his champagne, and it is from these sales that his profits or gains are derived. Accordingly, the first and main question to be considered in this appeal is, whether that which was actually done within the United Kingdom in relation to and for the promotion of his business by Louis Roederer, or by the appellants on his behalf, amounts to an exercise of his trade within the meaning of schedule D.

There may, in my opinion, be transactions by or on behalf of a foreign merchant in this country so intimately connected with his business abroad that without them it could not be successfully carried on, which are nevertheless insufficient to constitute an exercise of his trade here within the meaning of schedule D. In illustration of that view I may refer to Sulley v. Attorney-General, which was decided in the Exchequer Chamber by no less than six very eminent judges. An American firm carried on a business in New York, which consisted in the re-sale there of goods purchased on their account in England. One of the partners, who resided in Nottingham, bought the goods required by the firm, and paid for them with money remitted to him from New York. It was held, in these circumstances, that the firm did not exercise its trade in the United Kingdom in such sense as to bring its profits within the scope of the Income Tax Acts. One reason assigned for the decision was that the firm's transactions here did not involve any profits or gains, which were wholly dependent upon the re-sales effected by the firm on the other side of the Atlantic. The learned judges recognized the principle that purchasing stock in this country with the view of trading in it elsewhere does not of itself constitute an exercise of the trade in the United Kingdom, when that department of the business from which profits or gains are directly realized is carried on in another country.

If any substantial distinction could be drawn between canvassing through agents in this country for orders which are sent to Rheims for acceptance or rejection, and systematic purchase of goods in the English market for the purpose of trading with them in America, I am disposed to think that the distinction would not be unfavourable to the contention of the present appellants. There is no substantial difference between obtaining orders for wines according to the method pursued by Louis Roederer, and attracting customers to Rheims by advertising and sending circulars to the trade in England. Such things are done by British merchants in foreign countries, and are also done by foreign merchants in Britain, in the interest and for the promotion of their home business. If their business consists, as that of Louis Roederer does, in the sale of wines or other merchandise, neither the British nor the foreign merchant can, in my opinion, be said to exercise his trade beyond the limits of his own country, so long as all contracts for the sale of their goods, and all deliveries to the purchaser, are made within these limits.

The fact that some payments were made in cash to the appellants, and that they also received and forwarded drafts indorsed to Louis Roederer by buyers of his champagne, although it might have been of importance if he had exercised his trade in this country, does not appear to me to have a material bearing upon the question already discussed. When a trade is carried on in a foreign country, and British customers not only purchase but take delivery there, I do not think that the employment of an English agent to collect and remit the debts due to him by these purchasers can be regarded as an exercise of his trade in this country by the foreign merchant.

I am therefore of opinion that your lordships ought to reverse the judgments of the Appeal Court and of the Queen's Bench Division, and to find and declare that Louis Roederer did not, in the years 1884, 1885, and 1886 exercise his trade in the United Kingdom. In that view it becomes unnecessary to consider the question whether the appellants, as his agents, are responsible, in terms of section 41 of the Act of 1842. But, having heard a full argument upon the point, I desire to say that I am not prepared to hold with the learned judges in the courts below, that the words "having the receipt of any profits or gains," as they occur in that clause, refer only to a "receiver." The context of the Act appears to me to indicate that they ought to be read as applicable to each and all of the persons enumerated.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I have had an opportunity of considering the judgments which have already been delivered by my noble and learned friends, and I have nothing to add except that I concur in the motion proposed, and for the reasons which have been stated.

Lord MORRIS.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal, affirming the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division, should be affirmed. It is unnecessary for me to repeat all the facts of the case. The first and main question is, Did Louis Roederer exercise a trade in England? There can be no definition of the words "exercising a trade." It is only another mode of expressing "carrying on a business"; but it certainly carries with it the meaning that the business or trade must be habitually or systematically exercised, and that it cannot apply to isolated transactions. There is no special legal meaning to the words "exercising a trade," and it must be considered with regard to what would be its ordinary or popular meaning, and that must in each case depend on the facts of that particular case; and we are not to canvass what might be a logical outcome from any decision when it is the facts of the particular case that are solely decided on. I have heard no suggestion of any plainer or more intelligible meaning for the words "exercise his trade" than the words themselves convey.

Now, the leading facts of the case are: Roederer is an extensive wine maker at Rheims, in France. He ships, and for years has shipped, large quantities of champagne to England. The appellants are his agents in England. The offers or proposals for the purchase of Roederer's wines are sought for and received by the appellants, from customers, as such agents. As between Roederer and the appellants, he reserves the right to reject any particular order—a right stated in the case as intended to protect Roederer in cases of doubt of the solvency of the customer. No special notice is given to the customer of such right being reserved. The invoices of the wine, when shipped, are sent by Roederer to the appellants, who forward them to the customers. Direct payments by draft or order are made to Roederer more frequently than they are made to the appellants, and the receipts are sent by Roederer direct to the customers. Exhibits 1, 2, and 5 show the mode of dealing. Exhibit 5 gives the initiation of the transaction. It is addressed by the appellants to the proposed customer, and states they are instructed by their principal, Roederer, to inform him, &c. It then goes on to say: "Mr. L. Roederer will be prepared to ship champagne," and solicits orders for the wines now offered by Roederer at the prices referred to in an accompanying list. Roederer's stamp is affixed at the foot. Exhibit No. 1 shows an order addressed to the appellants, and requesting shipment; while exhibit No. 2 gives the reply of the appellants thus: "In compliance with your obliging order of yesterday, we shall have much pleasure in requesting Mr. L. Roederer to ship for your account," &c. These exhibits thus evidence an offer by the appellants, as the agent of Roederer, of wines at fixed prices, an order from the customer for a certain quantity, and an acceptance by the appellants. There is thus a completed contract between the customer and Roederer through his agents, the appellants, controlled perhaps by the limit of authority given by Roederer to the appellants, which limit is unknown to the customer. The question in this case is not whether the customer could recover from Roederer on any breach of the contract by reason of the limit of authority; but whether, as a matter of fact, Roederer is exercising his trade—in other words, carrying on business—in England. I am very clearly of opinion on the facts that he is exercising his trade in England, and I consider the insertion in the directory is a most material and important fact; for the appellants, with whom we are dealing, authorize the statement in the Post Office Directory, under the head of "Trades, Wine Merchants," as follows: "Roederer, Louis, Rheims, champagne merchant (Grainger & Son, agents), 21, Mincing-lane, E.C."—an averment by the appellants that Roederer carries on the business of a wine merchant at 21, Mincing-lane, and that they are his agents there. On the facts stated in the special case I entertain no doubt, as the Queen's Bench Division and the Court of Appeal entertained no doubt, that Louis Roederer exercised his trade of a wine merchant within the United Kingdom, to wit in London.

On the other question, whether the appellants were agents within the terms of section 41 of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, I am not prepared to hold that the words "having the receipt of any profits or gains" are applicable only to their immediate antecedent word "receiver," and are not applicable to the word "agent." I consider they are applicable to and control the word "agent" as well as the word "receiver," and there is no reason why an agent should be chargeable who was not in receipt of profits or gains; but in the present case the appellants were in fact, as agents of their principal Roederer, in receipt of moneys which included profits and gains; and being so come within the operation of section 41 of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35.

Lord DAVEY.—I am of opinion that this appeal should be allowed, for the reasons which have been already stated by your lordships who first addressed the House; and were it not that we are differing from the court below, and that your lordships are not unanimous, I should not find it necessary to add any observations of my own.

The question is whether, on the facts found in the original and amended cases stated by the commissioners, Roederer exercises a trade within the United Kingdom within the meaning of section 2, schedule D, of the Income Tax Act, 1853. I need not again analyze in detail the statements in the cases, but I

Son, agents), 21, Mincing-lane, E.C.," that being the address of the appellants, who carried on business as wine merchants on their own account, and also acted, during the period in question, as his agents. Beyond receiving payment in cash or bills on account of Louis Roederer, as will be presently noticed, the appellants' agency was limited to soliciting orders for champagne, either by themselves or through sub-agents who were appointed by them. These orders, when received, were not accepted by the appellants, who had no authority to that effect, but were transmitted by them to Louis Roederer at Rheims, who invariably reserved the right to reject any order forwarded to him. The necessary result of that course of dealing was that until Roederer had accepted the order there was no contract which could bind him or afford a right of action against him to the person who gave it.

When an order was accepted, the wines were packed in Rheims at the expense of the customer, to whom they were then forwarded direct, at his cost and risk. An invoice was made out at Rheims, charging the price of the wine, according to current lists furnished to the customer by the appellants, together with expenses of packing, &c., which was sent to the appellants for transmission to the customer. Each invoice contained a slip, requesting those customers who preferred paying by bill or cheque on Paris to have these drafts made out to their own order, and then to indorse them to Louis Roederer, so as to enable him to identify each remittance with the customer who sent it.

The appellants were remunerated for these services by a commission upon the orders which they procured. In some cases customers of Louis Roederer made payment to them in cash; but the money thus received by them rarely exceeded the sum due to them as commission, and then only to a small amount. The appellants also received English and foreign drafts and cheques in favour of Louis Roederer, for which they gave acknowledgments to the customer. These drafts and cheques were forwarded by them to Louis Roederer, who then sent a receipt direct to the customer.

These facts appear to me to raise a question in regard to the nature of the trading connection between Louis Roederer and his customers in the United Kingdom which is not covered by any previous decision. In Tischler v. Apthorpe and in Pommery v. Apthorpe the foreign wine merchant traded in this country through an English agent, who sold his wine in England and received the price, making delivery to the buyer either from the stock which had been sent to him by his principal or by directing a consignment to be sent from Rheims. In Werle v. Colquhoun the decision of the Court of Appeal was based upon the express ground that the foreign wine merchant exercised his trade in England by making contracts there for the sale of his champagne through his English agent. Erichsen v. Last, although it did not relate to the wine trade, was a decision of the same class. The telegraph company whose profits were assessed to income tax had its principal seat of business in Copenhagen; but it had offices and agents in various parts of the United Kingdom, where its agents made contracts for the transmission of messages through its wires, and received payment for sending them. I agree with the opinion expressed in that case by the present Master of the Rolls, that whenever a foreigner, either by himself or through a representative in this country, "habitually does, and contracts to do, a thing capable of producing profit and for the purpose of producing profit, he carries on a trade or business"; and that the profits or gains arising from these transactions in the United Kingdom are liable to income tax.

There is, in my opinion, a very broad distinction between the case of a foreigner making contracts in England with his English customers for the sale of his wines, either personally or through a representative, and the case of his making similar contracts with these customers in his own country. In the present instance the orders forwarded to Louis Roederer were, in law, nothing more than offers to purchase until the contract between him and each offerer was completed by his acceptance at Rheims; and he fulfilled his part of the contract by making delivery of the wine sold to the purchaser, and at the purchaser's risk, in Rheims. The trade of Louis Roederer consists in the sales of his champagne, and it is from these sales that his profits or gains are derived. Accordingly, the first and main question to be considered in this appeal is, whether that which was actually done within the United Kingdom in relation to and for the promotion of his business by Louis Roederer, or by the appellants on his behalf, amounts to an exercise of his trade within the meaning of schedule D.

There may, in my opinion, be transactions by or on behalf of a foreign merchant in this country so intimately connected with his business abroad that without them it could not be successfully carried on, which are nevertheless insufficient to constitute an exercise of his trade here within the meaning of schedule D. In illustration of that view I may refer to Sulley v. Attorney-General, which was decided in the Exchequer Chamber by no less than six very eminent judges. An American firm carried on a business in New York, which consisted in the re-sale there of goods purchased on their account in England. One of the partners, who resided in Nottingham, bought the goods required by the firm, and paid for them with money remitted to him from New York. It was held, in these circumstances, that the firm did not exercise its trade in the United Kingdom in such sense as to bring its profits within the scope of the Income Tax Acts. One reason assigned for the decision was that the firm's transactions here did not involve any profits or gains, which were wholly dependent upon the re-sales effected by the firm on the other side of the Atlantic. The learned judges recognized the principle that purchasing stock in this country with the view of trading in it elsewhere does not of itself constitute an exercise of the trade in the United Kingdom, when that department of the business from which profits or gains are directly realized is carried on in another country.

If any substantial distinction could be drawn between canvassing through agents in this country for orders which are sent to Rheims for acceptance or rejection, and systematic purchase of goods in the English market for the purpose of trading with them in America, I am disposed to think that the distinction would not be unfavourable to the contention of the present appellants. There is no substantial difference between obtaining orders for wines according to the method pursued by Louis Roederer, and attracting customers to Rheims by advertising and sending circulars to the trade in England. Such things are done by British merchants in foreign countries, and are also done by foreign merchants in Britain, in the interest and for the promotion of their home business. If their business consists, as that of Louis Roederer does, in the sale of wines or other merchandise, neither the British nor the foreign merchant can, in my opinion, be said to exercise his trade beyond the limits of his own country, so long as all contracts for the sale of their goods, and all deliveries to the purchaser, are made within these limits.

The fact that some payments were made in cash to the appellants, and that they also received and forwarded drafts indorsed to Louis Roederer by buyers of his champagne, although it might have been of importance if he had exercised his trade in this country, does not appear to me to have a material bearing upon the question already discussed. When a trade is carried on in a foreign country, and British customers not only purchase but take delivery there, I do not think that the employment of an English agent to collect and remit the debts due to him by these purchasers can be regarded as an exercise of his trade in this country by the foreign merchant.

I am therefore of opinion that your lordships ought to reverse the judgments of the Appeal Court and of the Queen's Bench Division, and to find and declare that Louis Roederer did not, in the years 1884, 1885, and 1886 exercise his trade in the United Kingdom. In that view it becomes unnecessary to consider the question whether the appellants, as his agents, are responsible, in terms of section 41 of the Act of 1842. But, having heard a full argument upon the point, I desire to say that I am not prepared to hold with the learned judges in the courts below, that the words "having the receipt of any profits or gains," as they occur in that clause, refer only to a "receiver." The context of the Act appears to me to indicate that they ought to be read as applicable to each and all of the persons enumerated.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I have had an opportunity of considering the judgments which have already been delivered by my noble and learned friends, and I have nothing to add except that I concur in the motion proposed, and for the reasons which have been stated.

Lord MORRIS.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal, affirming the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division, should be affirmed. It is unnecessary for me to repeat all the facts of the case. The first and main question is, Did Louis Roederer exercise a trade in England? There can be no definition of the words "exercising a trade." It is only another mode of expressing "carrying on a business"; but it certainly carries with it the meaning that the business or trade must be habitually or systematically exercised, and that it cannot apply to isolated transactions. There is no special legal meaning to the words "exercising a trade," and it must be considered with regard to what would be its ordinary or popular meaning, and that must in each case depend on the facts of that particular case; and we are not to canvass what might be a logical outcome from any decision when it is the facts of the particular case that are solely decided on. I have heard no suggestion of any plainer or more intelligible meaning for the words "exercise his trade" than the words themselves convey.

Now, the leading facts of the case are: Roederer is an extensive wine maker at Rheims, in France. He ships, and for years has shipped, large quantities of champagne to England. The appellants are his agents in England. The offers or proposals for the purchase of Roederer's wines are sought for and received by the appellants, from customers, as such agents. As between Roederer and the appellants, he reserves the right to reject any particular order—a right stated in the case as intended to protect Roederer in cases of doubt of the solvency of the customer. No special notice is given to the customer of such right being reserved. The invoices of the wine, when shipped, are sent by Roederer to the appellants, who forward them to the customers. Direct payments by draft or order are made to Roederer more frequently than they are made to the appellants, and the receipts are sent by Roederer direct to the customers. Exhibits 1, 2, and 5 show the mode of dealing. Exhibit 5 gives the initiation of the transaction. It is addressed by the appellants to the proposed customer, and states they are instructed by their principal, Roederer, to inform him, &c. It then goes on to say: "Mr. L. Roederer will be prepared to ship champagne," and solicits orders for the wines now offered by Roederer at the prices referred to in an accompanying list. Roederer's stamp is affixed at the foot. Exhibit No. 1 shows an order addressed to the appellants, and requesting shipment; while exhibit No. 2 gives the reply of the appellants thus: "In compliance with your obliging order of yesterday, we shall have much pleasure in requesting Mr. L. Roederer to ship for your account," &c. These exhibits thus evidence an offer by the appellants, as the agent of Roederer, of wines at fixed prices, an order from the customer for a certain quantity, and an acceptance by the appellants. There is thus a completed contract between the customer and Roederer through his agents, the appellants, controlled perhaps by the limit of authority given by Roederer to the appellants, which limit is unknown to the customer. The question in this case is not whether the customer could recover from Roederer on any breach of the contract by reason of the limit of authority; but whether, as a matter of fact, Roederer is exercising his trade—in other words, carrying on business—in England. I am very clearly of opinion on the facts that he is exercising his trade in England, and I consider the insertion in the directory is a most material and important fact; for the appellants, with whom we are dealing, authorize the statement in the Post Office Directory, under the head of "Trades, Wine Merchants," as follows: "Roederer, Louis, Rheims, champagne merchant (Grainger & Son, agents), 21, Mincing-lane, E.C."—an averment by the appellants that Roederer carries on the business of a wine merchant at 21, Mincing-lane, and that they are his agents there. On the facts stated in the special case I entertain no doubt, as the Queen's Bench Division and the Court of Appeal entertained no doubt, that Louis Roederer exercised his trade of a wine merchant within the United Kingdom, to wit in London.

On the other question, whether the appellants were agents within the terms of section 41 of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, I am not prepared to hold that the words "having the receipt of any profits or gains" are applicable only to their immediate antecedent word "receiver," and are not applicable to the word "agent." I consider they are applicable to and control the word "agent" as well as the word "receiver," and there is no reason why an agent should be chargeable who was not in receipt of profits or gains; but in the present case the appellants were in fact, as agents of their principal Roederer, in receipt of moneys which included profits and gains; and being so come within the operation of section 41 of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35.

Lord DAVEY.—I am of opinion that this appeal should be allowed, for the reasons which have been already stated by your lordships who first addressed the House; and were it not that we are differing from the court below, and that your lordships are not unanimous, I should not find it necessary to add any observations of my own.

The question is whether, on the facts found in the original and amended cases stated by the commissioners, Roederer exercises a trade within the United Kingdom within the meaning of section 2, schedule D, of the Income Tax Act, 1853. I need not again analyze in detail the statements in the cases, but I will merely state that the substance and effect of them appears to my mind to be shortly this. First, neither Grainger & Son nor the sub-agents appointed by them have any authority to make contracts for the sale of Roederer's wines. Their function in this part of the business is confined to soliciting and collecting orders for wine, which are forwarded to him in Rheims for execution by him if he thinks fit. Secondly, all contracts for the sale of wine are made in Rheims by Roederer himself, and the goods are invoiced in his name to the customer. In every instance they are delivered on board at Rheims at the expense and risk of the customer. The ordinary course is for the customers to pay Roederer direct in Rheims by cheques or drafts to his order. But Grainger & Son receive some cash and cheques on Roederer's account in London, though to an amount which rarely exceeds the commission due to them. Receipts for all money paid either to Roederer or through Grainger & Son are sent by Roederer to the customers direct. A form of receipt is annexed to the amended case.

Now, what does one mean by a trade, or the exercise of a trade? Trade, in its largest sense, is the business of selling, with a view to profit, goods which the trader has either manufactured himself or purchased. I cannot doubt, upon the facts found, that all Roederer's sales to his English customers are made at Rheims for delivery in that place, and the goods sold are in fact delivered to the customers in Rheims. So far as I can see, not a single bottle of wine is ever sold or delivered by Roederer either personally or through his agents in this country. It was, I think, admitted, and it cannot, in my opinion, be denied, that the mere fact of a foreigner selling his goods to English customers does not constitute an exercise of his trade within this country, although he is trading with this country. But it was argued that the habitual employment of agents to obtain orders and transmit them abroad constitutes the act of selling to English customers, an exercise of trade in this country. I am unable to accede to that argument. Canvassing for custom is no doubt ancillary to the exercise of trade, and it may be assumed that Roederer's trade with this country is increased by the employment of agents for that purpose, as it might be by systematic advertisement. But Roederer's trade is selling his champagne, and he exercises that trade where he makes his sales and the profits come home to him. Nor do I think it makes any difference that it is within the scope of Grainger & Son's authority to collect moneys for Roederer to the extent stated in the case. It is in my opinion no more than if Roederer were, for the convenience of his customers, to open a banking account in London, to which they might pay what they owe him.

I forbear to comment on the earlier cases which have been decided on this section, because they all differ in the vital respect that sales of goods were in those cases made in England. The case of Sulley v. Attorney-General, so far as it goes, is in the appellants' favour.

In the view which I take, it is not necessary to decide the other point which has been raised—whether Grainger & Son are such agents as described in section 41 of the Act of 1842. I will only say that I think the words "having the receipt of any profits or gains," &c., should grammatically be read with the words "factor, agent, or receiver," and not with "receiver" only, and that "having the receipt of any profits or gains" does not mean "any part of the profits or gains," but "the taxable profits or gains of any business," &c. I feel great doubt whether, on the facts of the present case, Grainger & Son were such agents; but it is not necessary to decide that.

CARTER v. RIGBY. (a.)

County court—Practice—Parties—Joinder of plaintiffs—Action under Employers' Liability Act—County Court Rules, 1889, ord. 3, r. 1; ord. 44, rr. 18, 19.

The plaintiffs in an action brought in the county court under the Employers' Liability Act were the personal representatives of fifty deceased miners who were drowned in consequence of the flooding of a mine.

Held, on the authority of Smurthwaite v. Hannay, 43 W. R. 113, [1894] A. C. 494, that, notwithstanding ord. 3, r. 1, and ord. 44, rr. 18 and 19, of the County Court Rules, 1889, the plaintiffs, having separate causes of action, could not properly be joined in one action.

Appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court on an appeal from the County Court of Staffordshire.

The action was brought under the Employers' Liability Act and Lord Campbell's Act to recover compensation in respect of the deaths of fifty miners who were drowned in consequence of the flooding of a coal mine in North Staffordshire. The plaintiffs were the personal representatives of the fifty deceased men, and they alleged that all the deceased men lost their lives by reason of the negligence of the defendants' servants, which resulted in the flooding of the mine.

The defendants applied for an order that the names of all the plaintiffs except one should be struck out.

The county court judge refused to make such order.

On appeal the Queen's Bench Division (Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., and Wright, J.) held, on the authority of Smurthwaite v. Hannay, 43 W. R. 113, [1894] A. C. 494, that the plaintiffs were not entitled to join in bringing one action, and granted the defendants' application.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Bigham, Q.C., and C. A. Russell, for the plaintiffs.—Ord. 3, r. 1, of the County Court Rules, 1889, says that "all persons may be joined as plaintiffs in whom the right to any relief claimed is alleged to exist, whether jointly, severally, or in the alternative." In Smurthwaite v. Hannay the House of Lords held that under ord. 16, r. 1, of the Rules of the Supreme Court, which is in exactly the same terms, plaintiffs could not be joined in the same action where they had separate causes of action. But an action brought in the county court under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, is in a different position from an action which is regulated solely by the Rules of the Supreme Court. The Employers' Liability Act, by section 6, sub-section 3, provided for the making of rules of procedure for actions brought under that Act. Rules were made under the power so created, and they were afterwards incorporated in the County Court

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Rules of 1889 as order 44. Rules 18 and 19 of that order deal with the case where several plaintiffs are joined in one action. At that time the interpretation of the rule as to joinder of parties was governed by the case of Booth v. Briscoe, 25 W. R. 838, 2 Q. B. D. 496, in which it was held that eight persons who had been affected by one libel and had joined in one action were rightly joined. Ord. 3, r. 1, ought to be read with ord. 44, rr. 18 and 19, as forming a separate code with regard to the joinder of parties in actions brought under the Employers' Liability Act. Although the House of Lords have put a particular interpretation upon the words of ord. 16, r. 1, of the Rules of the Supreme Court, yet the same words occurring in ord. 3, r. 1, of the County Court Rules have to be read with a context; and when they are so read a different interpretation ought to be put upon them. The code read as a whole clearly allows the joinder of these plaintiffs.

Jelf, Q.C., and W. Ellis Hill, for the defendants, cited Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Co. v. Tsune Kijima, [1895] A. C. 661.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice and Wright, J., is correct, and that it must be upheld. I come to this conclusion simply because we are bound by the decision of the House of Lords in Smurthwaite v. Hannay. Great difficulties have been raised by reason of that decision, and in this case Lord Russell says he wishes he could decide otherwise, and he hopes that the Rule Committee will alter the rule in question; but that he now submits to the decision of the House of Lords.

How does the case stand? The decision in Smurthwaite v. Hannay was on the construction of ord. 16, r. 1, of the Rules of the Supreme Court, which provides that "all persons may be joined as plaintiffs in whom the right to any relief claimed is alleged to exist, whether jointly, severally, or in the alternative; and judgment may be given for such one or more of the plaintiffs as may be found to be entitled to relief, for such relief as he or they may be entitled to, without any amendment." Ord. 3, r. 1, of the County Court Rules, 1889, is framed in precisely the same words. The House of Lords have determined that a rule so worded means that such plaintiffs as are now before the court cannot be joined in one writ, although the conduct of the defendants which is alleged to give rise to liability is the same in the case of each and all of the plaintiffs.

We are now asked to allow the joinder of these plaintiffs, and it is argued that ord. 3, r. 1, of the County Court Rules, when read with ord. 44, r. 18, provides for such joinder being made. We must construe ord. 44, r. 18. It says: "Where two or more persons are joined as plaintiffs under ord. 3, r. 1, and the negligence, act, or omission which is the cause of action shall be proved, the judgment shall be for all the plaintiffs, but the amount of the sum so awarded for damages and costs ordered to be paid to each such plaintiff shall be found and set forth in the judgment," &c. The introductory clause, "Where two or more persons are joined as plaintiffs under ord. 3, r. 1," is a condition to the applicability of the rule; and it must be construed to mean "where two or more persons are properly joined as plaintiffs under ord. 3, r. 1." If there are no plaintiffs so properly joined, the rest of the rule is not applicable. It is clear that according to the interpretation of the House of Lords these plaintiffs cannot properly be joined under ord. 3, r. 1, and therefore no subsequent part of rule 18 applies.

KAY, L.J.—This is an action brought under the Employers' Liability Act and Lord Campbell's Act. The plaintiffs are the personal representatives of fifty deceased persons, who were miners, and the question is whether their separate causes of action in respect of the death of each miner can be joined in one action. By section 6, sub-section 3, of the Employers' Liability Act, it was enacted that for the purpose of regulating the conditions and mode of appointment and remuneration of assessors under the Act, and all matters of procedure relating to their duties, and also for the purpose of consolidating any actions under the Act in a county court, and otherwise preventing multiplicity of such actions, rules might be made in the same manner as rules for regulating the practice and procedure in other actions in county courts. That was in 1880, and in 1889 County Court Rules were made, one part of which —viz., order 44—is headed "The Employers' Liability Act, 1880." The rules contained in this order were made under the powers conferred by that Act. I think there is no doubt that these rules do contemplate that different causes of action may be joined in an action under the Employers' Liability Act; they do not say expressly that such a thing may be done, but they contemplate it. Rules 18 and 19 are under the heading "Judgment where several plaintiffs." Rule 18 says, "Where two or more persons are joined as plaintiffs under ord. 3, r. 1, and the negligence, act, or omission which is the cause of action shall be proved, the judgment shall be for all the plaintiffs, but the amount of the sum so awarded for damages and the costs ordered to be paid to each such plaintiff shall be found and set forth in the judgment, and the amount of costs awarded in the action shall be ordered to be paid to such person and in such manner as the court may think fit." It seems to me that this rule clearly contemplates that several causes of action may be joined together under ord. 3, r. 1. Rule 19, which provides for the payment of a dividend to each plaintiff in case of the proceeds of execution being insufficient, is pervaded with the same idea. It was argued that these rules are satisfied by the case where one person is killed, and he has no personal representative in the strict sense, and where by statute his widow or children may sue. I do not think that these words are satisfied by that case alone. I think these rules contemplate the death of more than one person being joined in one action under ord. 3, r. 1.

We must, however, turn to ord. 3, r. 1, and see whether it does permit such joinder. This rule is in the same terms as ord. 16, r. 1, of the Rules of the Supreme Court. In the case of Smurthwaite v. Hannay the House of Lords decided that such joinder could not be made under ord. 16, r. 1. They held that it only authorized the joinder of several plaintiffs where they had one cause of action. We are bound by that, and are obliged to say that these plaintiffs cannot be joined. I can see no reason why there should be a difference in this respect between a case of tort and a case of contract.

It was conceded in argument that this was so in every case except in an action under the Employers' Liability Act. The contention was that ord. 3, r. 1, must be read with rules 18 and 19 of order 44, as constituting a code of procedure as to parties in actions under the Employers' Liability Act; and it was said that when taken in that context it was capable of a different interpretation. In my opinion that is not a proper mode of using a context. It cannot properly be said that the rule has one meaning when applied to ordinary actions and another meaning when applied to actions under the Employers' Liability Act. I feel bound by the decision of the House of Lords, and I think that the judgment of the Divisional Court must be affirmed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The plaintiffs have brought this action in the county court under the Employers' Liability Act for separate and distinct causes of action of tort. Under the Judicature Acts ord. 16, r. 1, was made, which allows all persons to be joined as plaintiffs in whom the right to any relief is alleged to exist, whether jointly, severally, or in the alternative. In 1877 a decision was given on that rule in Booth v. Briscoe, in which it was held that several plaintiffs might join in an action brought in respect of one libel, although their causes of action were separate. In 1880 the Employers' Liability Act was passed, and power was given to frame rules for regulating the procedure in actions brought under that Act. In 1889 County Court Rules were made, among them being ord. 3, r. 1—which is a copy of ord. 16, r. 1, of the High Court Rules—and ord. 44, rr. 18 and 19. When the county court judges drew these rules they had before them the case of Booth v. Briscoe. But then came the case of Smurthwaite v. Hannay in the House of Lords, in which it was held that the words occurring in ord. 3, r. 1, do not permit the joinder of plaintiffs who have separate causes of action; and since then there has been the case of Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Co. v. Tsune Kijima in the Privy Council. It is said that the county court judges having power to make rules allowing such a joinder of plaintiffs have done so in ord. 44, rr. 18 and 19. But "persons joined as plaintiffs under ord. 3, r. 1," means persons joined as ord. 3, r. 1, permits. Ord. 3, r. 1, does not permit the joinder of these plaintiffs, and therefore rules 18 and 19 do not fit this case. In my opinion the attempt to read the rule in different ways fails.

Appeal dismissed.

MAYVILLE, LA COMPAGNIE DE (LIMITED) v. WHITLEY. (a.)

Company—Directors—Meeting—Notice of business to be transacted—"Extraordinary" business—Name of company, Authority to use.

In point of law directors of a company are not bound to give notice beforehand of extraordinary business which is to be transacted at a board meeting in order to render such business transactions valid.

S., a director of the M. Co., obtained the assent of five out of the seven subscribers to the memorandum of association of the company to the use of the name of the company as co-plaintiffs in an action brought by S. against his co-directors.

Held, that S. had no proper authority for the use of the name of the company. Such authority must be obtained either from the board of directors or from a meeting of the shareholders convened for that purpose.

Appeal from North, J.

The plaintiff company, which is an English one, was formed in May, 1895, for the purpose of developing a building estate and establishing a watering-place at Le Touquet, near Calais. The capital of the company was £400,000 in £1 shares. Seven persons signed the memorandum of association and subscribed for one share each. The articles of association provided that the first directors should be appointed by the subscribers of the memorandum of association, the total number not exceeding nine.

Article 94 provided: "The first directors shall have power to appoint any other persons to be directors at any time before the ordinary general meeting to be held in the year 1896, but so that the total number of directors shall not at any time exceed the maximum hereinbefore prescribed."

The directors had power to fill up casual vacancies in their number, and two were to form a quorum at their meetings. Seven directors were originally appointed by the subscribers, of whom H. S. Seal and Henri Tellier, a French gentleman, resident in France, accepted office. Whitley, the first defendant to the action, although originally appointed a director, did not know of his appointment for some considerable time, and on the 3rd of February, 1896, a resolution was entered in the minute-book appointing him a director in the place of F. C. Burnand, resigned.

Whitley at once commenced to act as a director, and under his instructions the books and papers of the company were removed from No. 7, Serjeant's-inn (Seal's office) to the Constitutional Club, of which Whitley was a member, and the registered office of the company was changed from No. 7, Serjeant's-inn to No. 14, Cockspur-street.

On the 14th of February, 1896, Whitley and Tellier held a meeting in the bedroom of the former at the Constitutional Club. Seal had not had notice of this meeting, and the directors purported to pass resolutions appointing Sir Terence O'Brien, K.C.M.G., a director, and appointing Messrs. Lee & Pembertons solicitors, and Messrs. Charles Hopkinson & Sons bankers of the company, and other business was transacted.

So far no shares had been allotted, the applications for them having been but few.

On the 22nd of February, Seal obtained the consent of five of the subscribers to the memorandum of association to the use of the name of the company as plaintiffs, and issued a writ by which he sought to restrain his co-directors from excluding him from meetings of the directors, from holding meetings without due notice, and asking for other consequential relief. On the same day, but before the writ had been served, Seal received notice of a meeting of directors called for the 24th of February. The proposed business for such meeting was not stated, but Whitley wrote to Seal saying that "the business will be brought up which was the subject of the meeting held on the 14th." Seal did not attend this meeting, at which the resolutions passed on the 14th were confirmed, and some additional business was transacted, including the allotment of 500 shares each to Whitley and Tellier and Sir Terence O'Brien and General Sir Richard Taylor, the necessary qualification for directors; and they were appointed additional directors. A resolution was also passed that the solicitors of the company, Messrs. Lee & Pembertons, be instructed to take all necessary steps to prevent the name of the company being used by Seal in his action against Whitley and Tellier.

Another board meeting was held on the 2nd of March; there were present Seal, Whitley, O'Brien, and Taylor. A further allotment of shares was made in spite of Seal's opposition, the total number of shareholders being brought up to forty-two, so that meetings of the company might be held. Seal, in the name of the company, added O'Brien and Taylor as defendants to the action, and moved for an injunction to restrain the defendants (inter alia) from excluding Seal from acting as director, from holding meetings of directors without due notice, and from acting on the resolutions purporting to have been passed on the 14th and 24th of February, and to restrain O'Brien and Taylor from acting as directors. The solicitors of the company filed a cross-motion, in the name of the company, asking that the record might be amended by striking out the name of the company as plaintiffs, on the ground that the name had been used without proper authority, and also asking that Seal's solicitors might be ordered to pay the company's costs of the action and of the present application.

On the hearing of the two motions North, J., was of opinion that the meeting of the 14th of February was invalid, because no notice of it had been given to Mr. Seal, and that the meeting of the 24th of February was also invalid, because the notice did not state the business to be transacted at that meeting, such business being "unusual" and not "routine" business. In consequence Sir Terence O'Brien and Sir Richard Taylor had not been duly appointed directors, and the injunction asked against them must go. His lordship was also of opinion that there had been no attempt to exclude Mr. Seal, so that that part of the injunction failed. The injunction was granted to restrain the defendants from holding meetings of directors without due notice given. On the cross-motion his lordship declined to interfere, on the ground that even if the company's name had been used without authority, the motion to strike out was made equally without authority.

The defendants and the company appealed.

Vernon Smith, Q.C., and Gore-Browne, for the defendants.—There is no rule of law which says that a notice convening a meeting of directors must state the business which is to be transacted at that meeting, and any such rule would be extremely embarrassing to companies. Lord Tenterden in The King v. Pulsford, 8 B. & C. 350, at p. 354, laid down an intelligent principle that where there are a select few whose duty it is to meet and consider the business to be brought before them no notice of such business is necessary. That principle has always been acted upon by companies. The cases relied upon by the plaintiffs in the court below, In re Homer District Consolidated Gold Mines, 39 Ch. D. 546, 37 W. R. Dig. 36, and In re London & Southern Counties Freehold Land Co., 34 W. R. 163, 31 Ch. D. 223, may be distinguished. Seal should have protested against the holding of the meeting of the 24th of February at the time, and insisted on its being postponed; as he did not do so, but merely absented himself, he is now too late: Browne v. La Trinidad, 36 W. R. 289, 37 Ch. D. 1. Wills v. Murray, 4 Ex. 843, shows that notice of the business transacted is not usually necessary, unless there is an article expressly saying that notice must be given.

Younger, for the company.—I ask for an order in the same form as that in Newbiggin-by-the-Sea Gas Co. v. Armstrong, 28 W. R. 217, 13 Ch. D. 310. To authorize the use of the company's name the subscribers to the memorandum of association must all meet and give their consent: In re Great Northern Salt and Chemical Works, 44 Ch. D. 472, 38 W. R. Dig. 33. The authority given to Seal was only an authority to rescind the resolution come to on the 14th of February; it did not authorize the use of the name of the company for any other purpose.

He also referred to John Morley Building Co. v. Barras, 39 W. R. 619, [1891] 2 Ch. 386.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Peterson, for Seal.—Whitley was not a first director, and therefore under article 94 had no power to appoint additional directors. Moreover, the directors were not justified in issuing shares to their own nominees for the purpose of packing a meeting: Fraser v. Whalley, 2 H. & M. 10, 13 W. R. Ch. Dig. 42. We submit the allotment of shares was invalid, and the directors had no power to make use of their own improper resolutions. This action must be right in any event: Pulbrook v. Richmond Consolidated Mining Co., 27 W. R. 377, 9 Ch. D. 610. Seal was justified in using the name of the company; it is not necessary to obtain the sanction of a general meeting: Pender v. Lushington, 6 Ch. D. 70, 25 W. R. Dig. 64. Moreover, he got the assent of an absolute majority of the company to the use of its name. A "casual vacancy" under the articles can only apply to a case where a director has accepted office and then resigned.

Vernon Smith, Q.C., and Younger replied.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This case involves one question at least of immense importance to companies. The rest of the points are comparatively trifling. The great point is that raised in respect of the necessity of giving notice when a directors' meeting is held—not only a notice of the meeting, but a notice of the business to be transacted at the meeting. I am not prepared to say as a matter of law that it is necessary. As a matter of prudence it is very often done, and it is a very wise thing to do; but it strikes me, as it struck Lord Tenterden as long ago as the case referred to, The King v. Pulsford, that there is an immense difference between meetings of shareholders or corporators and meetings of those whose business it is to attend for the transaction of their affairs. Nothing is more common than for directors conducting a company's business to meet, say, once a week or once a month without giving notice at all either of the day or of what they are going to do. Being paid for their services, which they generally are—and they are in this company—it is the duty of the directors to go when there is any business to be done, and to attend to that business whatever it is; and I cannot say that, as a matter of law, now for the first time, the business conducted at a directors' meeting is invalid because the directors have had no notice of the kind of business which may happen to come before them. Such a law would be extremely embarrassing to the transaction of the business of companies. Now, Lord Tenterden had the very point before him in regard to municipal corporations in The King v. Pulsford. I need not refer to the facts, but the point was taken there that, a notice was not given of the business to be transacted at a meeting of the managing body. [His lordship read from Lord Tenterden's judgment, at p. 354, and continued:—] He decided that there was sufficient notice in that case. Then, so far as I know, the only other case in which this point has ever been brought forward or considered is the case of The Homer District Consolidated Gold Mines, Ex parte Smith. That case, no doubt, contains a passage in the judgment of North, J., which goes to show that he thought it was important, at all events, to observe that the purpose for which the directors' meeting which was in question there was called, was not stated; but when you come to look at the case you find, whatever may have been said about the necessity for the giving of any such notice, the decision itself is absolutely right. That case, except so far as it relates to the notice, is not in point here; but we are asked to say now, for the first time, as a matter of law that a notice must be given to the directors, of directors' meetings stating what the business is, if it is anything more than routine business. If we did so, I think we should be stating that which is not sound law. It is not required for the honest transaction of business, and would be most disastrous. That is the only great point in this case. [His lordship then considered the facts and the evidence, and continued:—] The appeal of the directors against this injunction must therefore be allowed, on the ground that the appointment of Sir Richard Taylor and Sir Terence O'Brien was valid, and that there is nothing in point of law which invalidates the resolutions of the 24th of February, 1896.

Now, as regards the motion to strike out the name of the company, which had been used by Mr. Seal under the authority to which I have referred. As to that motion I think Mr. Younger is right. I think the evidence shows that Mr. Seal had no authority whatever to use the name of this company in these proceedings. A great deal, of course, turns upon what I have already said; because if what was done on the 24th of February, 1896, was valid, the appointment of the solicitor was valid, and Mr. Seal could not possibly have any authority at all. But he says: "I brought this action and served the writ before that, on the 22nd, when all I knew was the irregular proceeding and the irregular meeting of the 14th of February." What authority has he even to do that? He had not the authority of any meeting of the shareholders. He has the authority of five out of the seven subscribers it is true—got by him, I suppose, by sending round and asking them for their sanction. But I think that authority is not worth the paper it is written upon. If authority is wanted to use the name of the company, it must be authority got from the proper quarter—either from the directors or from the shareholders convened for the purpose. This is neither one nor the other. It follows that the name of the company ought to be struck out, and the costs ought to be paid by Mr. Seal, who has improperly used their name. Mr. Younger has put his view that the costs ought to be paid by the solicitor. I am against him as to that, I do not think any proper case has been made for any such extraordinary order as that. I know there are cases, and Mr. Younger has called attention to one, in which the solicitor putting the name of a company on a writ without authority had to pay costs; but it is to be borne in mind that the solicitor here is acting for the company and Mr. Seal too. Therefore upon that appeal the order will be made according to the notice of motion, and the costs will be paid by Seal, not by the solicitors. It appears to me that this is a litigation which ought never to have been brought. There is not the slightest ground or justification for it.

KAY, L.J.—In this case two questions have been argued, which are of considerable importance. The first question is this, Can the directors of a joint-stock trading company pass resolutions at their meetings as to matters not specified in the notice summoning the meeting or in an agenda paper added to the notice, saying what matters are to be discussed at the meeting? As I understand the learned judge's judgment he does not hold that notice to summon a directors' meeting must contain all, an agenda paper showing all business to be done at the meeting. But he says, if I have read the judgment rightly, that where the business is of an extraordinary or unusual character then notice must be given of it; or else at the meeting, if such business is transacted, any resolution passed as to such business will be invalid. One can see at once in what an enormous difficulty that would place directors. Who is to decide what is such extraordinary business that notice of it ought to be given? The learned judge feels that difficulty, because in the shorthand note of the judgment he is reported to have said: "Then it was said, 'Where are you to draw the line between what is important business of which notice should be given and what is not important business of which notice need not be given?' I have no intention of drawing any such line. It would be impossible to do so, and it would also be very inexpedient to attempt to do it. Nay, more, you may have matters going to be done with one company which may be very important business indeed, but with another company the transaction may be such as not to be a specially important matter for the company and it might be a matter of common occurrence. Therefore I do not intend to draw any line, except to say, and I do say, that wherever you draw the line the appointment of directors and the allotment of shares under such circumstances as the present, are both cases that come on the side of the line on which matters will be found with respect to which notice should be given. In my opinion, therefore, it was essential for the validity of the resolution passed at the meeting that Mr. Seal, an absent director, should have had notice that it was the intention to associate with him and the other two two new directors, and also that he should have had notice of the intention to proceed to allotment of shares of the company." If I understand rightly the meaning of his language, it is not necessary in every case to give notice of the business to be done at a directors' meeting, but such business as was transacted at the meeting of the 24th of February cannot be validly transacted unless—not notice of the meeting of directors—but notice of such business to be transacted at the meeting is given. I have never heard that laid down. As a matter of law I agree there is a great difference between a meeting of the directors of a joint-stock company and a meeting of the company itself. I am not going to say a word as to what is proper notice to be given in the case of a meeting of the shareholders. This is a meeting of directors who have to transact the ordinary business of the company, and I do not see how as a matter of business such a rule as this would be a workable rule at all. It would put directors in very great difficulty indeed as to the necessity of notice, and the only safe course for them to take would be to send an agenda paper to every director of the business to be transacted, in order that they might be sure that they did not omit to give him notice of such business as in the opinion of a judge before whom the matter might come would be such important business as that they ought to give notice of it.

Now, one knows very well that this is not the ordinary course. In many cases, as Lindley, L.J., has pointed out, the meetings of the directors are held at stated periods, and they are held on a particular day in every week or every month as the case may be, and no notice whatever is given of those meetings to any director at all. It is very often the case that, where some extraordinary business is going to be done, notice is sent of that meeting to the directors, and that such and such business will be transacted; and that is a very useful and proper and wise thing to do; but to say that it is absolutely imperative, and that without such a notice the business cannot be transacted is, I think, not according to the law; and as a rule it would be most inconvenient and would hamper the business of directors of a joint-stock company. I will not refer again to the authority (The King v. Pulsford) referred to by Lindley, L.J., but it seems to me to be completely against the view that there is any such law at all; and, with all respect to the learned judge in the court below, I think that his judgment on that point was not according to the law of this country, and I think there is nothing special in this case which would make it imperative to give the directors any such notice.

I see, looking at the articles of association, that there is an article which says that when any special business is to be transacted at a meeting of shareholders, of that special business notice shall be given. But there is nothing of that kind with respect to a meeting of the directors, and there is no article whatever that I can find that says anything about notice being given to convene meetings of directors. Now, besides that, there is another fact in this case which seems to me to be material with reference to this question. The directors are to be paid by a yearly salary, and unless they omit to attend for a considerable time they will receive that salary whether they are at the meetings or not. In many cases the directors are paid (and it seems to me a very much better way) only for the meetings at which they attend; but in this case, where they are paid by a regular annual salary, the temptation to attend by a proxy, if they can, is strong. But no honest man would draw the salary and keep away from the meeting if he could attend; therefore there is special reason in the present case why a director should be present at a directors' meeting, whether he knows what is the particular business to be transacted at that particular meeting or not. I therefore think that on that point—and it is a very important point—we must decide that in point of law, even when extraordinary business is to be transacted at a directors' meeting, it is not necessary to give notice beforehand of the intention to transact even that extraordinary business.

The other important question is—Is this a case in which a person in the position of Mr. Seal had a right to use the name of the company and to bring this action? [His lordship read the writ, and continued:—] Now, I must express my opinion that in the whole of that writ there is only one thing in respect of which Mr. Seal would be justified in bringing an action against the company, and that is to prevent himself being excluded from acting as director, supposing he could make a case on it; but all the rest of it seems to me to be an interference with the internal management of the company, about which this court does not allow members of a company or directors of a company to involve the company in litigation. The proper course, as is pointed out in Foss v. Harbottle, 2 Hare 461, is to call a meeting, and that is the remedy which any shareholder or director has in respect of all these irregularities, except alone the alleged exclusion of Mr. Seal from acting as a director. If there were irregularities in the transaction of the business of the company, those irregularities a meeting of the shareholders could condone and make perfectly right if they chose. Such meeting is practically the only remedy which this court allows a director or a shareholder of a company to take: otherwise we should have companies torn to pieces by litigation of this kind. The court has always set itself resolutely against such litigation.

In my opinion the whole of this action is entirely wrong, and no one knows better than a solicitor in Mr. Seal's position that an action of this kind ought not, under the circumstances of this case, to have been brought. I quite agree that the name of the company ought to be struck out, and I think the costs, as between solicitor and client, should be paid by Mr. Seal, and that the rest of the order should be discharged, with costs.

A. L. Smith, L.J.—As regards the first point—namely, that Mr. Seal had no notice of the object for which the meeting was called—not only do I agree with what has fallen from Lindley, L.J., but I think with the Lord Justice that Lord Tenterden's decision in Rex v. Pulaford covers this case. This was a selected board of directors, and without notice of the business to be transacted the directors were bound to attend if they performed their duty. Mr. Seal was bound to go to the meeting if he had notice when the meeting was going to take place, and therefore it is not right, it is not good law, to say that everything which was done by two properly appointed directors, who formed a quorum, was wrong because the other had not notice of what they were going to do. That point therefore fails.

Then comes the question, What right had he to use the company's name? None at all, in my opinion. He says that he had a right to use it because of the document he got of the 22nd of February, 1896, from the clerks and others. But that is not an authority from the shareholders. I do not find it is, and Mr. Younger has pointed out with considerable force that even if it were so that is only an authorization of those five gentlemen to deal with what had taken place at the bedroom meeting. For these reasons I think Mr. Seal is hopelessly in the wrong, and I think he should be mulcted in costs.

The appeal will be allowed, with costs.

In re Watson.
Turner v. Watson. (a.)

Principal—Surety—Executor—Retainer.

A testator mortgaged a reversionary interest as surety for his son, and died bequeathing a share of the residue of his estate to this son. After the testator's death the son became a bankrupt (in 1859) and never obtained his discharge. Neither the executors nor mortgagees proved in the bankruptcy. Certain payments were made by the executors and also by beneficiaries under the will to the mortgagees, who, however, ultimately sold the testator's reversionary interest in 1869, and out of the proceeds of sale retained the mortgage debt and handed over the balance to the executors. Upon the testator's residuary estate becoming divisible in 1894,

Held, that the testator's executors were entitled to retain as against the son's share of the residue, the amount of the mortgage debt retained by the mortgagees, and the payments made by the executors to the mortgagees, with interest at 4 per cent., but were not entitled to retain the amount contributed by other beneficiaries, nor to damages caused by the sale of the reversion instead of waiting for it to fall in.

Originating summons.

By an indenture dated the 29th of August, 1854, Thomas James Watson assigned to J. E. Clowes and T. G. Kensit one-seventh part of a sum of £7,333 6s. 8d. Consols, to which he was entitled subject to the life interest of his mother, Susannah Watson, by way of further security for £500 advanced to his son, J. J. W. Watson, together with interest thereon. J. J. W. Watson assigned to the mortgagees a policy of insurance upon his life and covenanted to pay the £500 and interest, and both father and son covenanted to pay interest at 5 per cent. and the premiums on the policy. A power of sale was conferred upon the mortgagees.

Thomas James Watson, by his will, dated the 3rd of December, 1857, appointed his wife Caroline Watson, John Evans, and W. H. Turner executrix and executors, and gave his residuary estate to John Evans and W. H. Turner upon trust to pay the income to his wife during her life or widowhood, and upon her death or remarriage to divide the same between Mrs. White, James H. Watson, J. J. W. Watson, and Musgrave Watson, in the proportions of one-third to Mrs. White and two-thirds to be divided among the three sons.

The testator died on the 3rd of December, 1857.

J. J. W. Watson was adjudicated a bankrupt in June, 1859. The bankruptcy was never closed, nor did the bankrupt obtain either a certificate under the Bankruptcy Act of 1849 or an order of discharge under the Bankruptcy Act of 1861. Neither the executors nor the mortgagees proved in the bankruptcy.

In order to prevent the sale by the mortgagees of the testator's reversionary interest, the interest due under the mortgage was contributed by the beneficiaries and executors. £40 12s. 7d. was paid by his widow, £40 10s. 8d. by Mrs. White, £40 10s. 8d. by J. H. Watson, and £122 10s. 2d. by the executors.

In 1869 the mortgagees sold the reversionary interest for £690. After paying succession duty, £6 18s.; auctioneer's charges, £29 10s.; costs of sale, £23 14s. 10d.; and £525 4s. 8d. for principal, interest, and costs, they handed the balance, £104 12s. 6d., to the executors on the 9th of February, 1870.

Susannah Watson died in 1871. The bankrupt died on the 5th of February, 1886, and the testator's widow died on the 29th of August, 1894, when the testator's property became divisible.

W. C. Turner, the executor of the surviving executor of the testator's will, took out this summons to determine if, as trustee of the residuary estate of the testator, he was at liberty to retain out of the share of J. J. W. Watson all or any of the sums representing payments made and loss incurred by reason of the testator's liability as surety for J. J. W. Watson.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and W. E. Mozley, for the plaintiff.

Vernon Smith, Q.C., and G. Cave, for J. H. Watson and the representatives of Mrs. White.—The executors' right of retainer is not affected by the bankruptcy, which occurred after the death of the testator, and in that this case differs from Cherry v. Boultbee, 4 My. & Cr. 442. The bankrupt's assignees take subject to any equities there may be: Jeffs v. Wood, 2 P. Wms. 128. The bankrupt must account for the £122 10s. paid by the executors before becoming entitled to any share of the residue, and the payments made by the residuary legatees must be presumed to have been made at the request of the executors and stand on the same footing. There is the same right of indemnity as to the money retained by the mortgagees, which was in substance paid by the testator's estate: In re Akerman, 40 W. R. 12, [1891] 3 Ch. 212; Petre v. Duncombe, 20 L. J. Q. B. 242.

R. J. Parker, for Musgrave Watson.

C. James, for the assignees in bankruptcy of J. J. W. Watson, was stopped as to the payments made by the beneficiaries.—The executors had no right of retainer. At the time of the death of the testator the son was only under a contingent liability to the testator. The son's subsequent bankruptcy converted this into a right of proof, and until then there was not any subsisting debt: Cherry v. Boultbee, Courtenay v. Williams, 3 Hare 539; In re Taylor, 42 W. R. 373, [1894] 1 Ch. 674. Before the bankruptcy the executors never had a fund payable to the person liable to pay the debt. A debt cannot be retained out of a specific legacy, and a future debt cannot be retained or set off: In re Rees, 60 L. T. N. S. 260, 37 W. R. Dig. 80. There is no contract implied to pay interest, and certainly not at a higher rate than 4 per cent.

Vernon Smith, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 31.—NORTH, J., stated the facts and continued:—If the son were alive and not a bankrupt the case would be quite clear. Willes v. Greenhill, 9 W. R. 217, 29 Beav. 376, and In re Akerman show that the executor would be entitled to retain the son's debt, treating it as being so much in his hands on account of his share of the estate. Courtenay v. Williams and In re Akerman also show that the lapse of time since the son's bankruptcy in 1859, or since the realization of the security in 1869, would not affect the executors' right to retain. But there having been a bankruptcy, the question is as to the position of the assignees in bankruptcy of the son. I take it that they stand in no better position than the son himself would if he were alive and not bankrupt. [His lordship referred to Bousfield v. Lawford, 11 W. R. 842, 1 De G. J. & S. 459, and the judgment of Knight-Bruce, L.J., ib., p. 463, and to In re Batchelor, L. R. 16 Eq. 481, 22 W. R. Dig. 141.] Cherry v. Boultbee and In re Hodgson, 27 W. R. 38, 9 Ch. D. 673, were cited as authorities to the contrary, but in both these cases the bankruptcy took place during the lifetime of the testator, and the ground of the decision was that the executors were never entitled to the debt, but only to a dividend.

In the present case no one ever proved against the bankrupt's estate in respect of this debt. The father's executors were not, at the date of the son's bankruptcy, in a position to prove. The only persons who could prove were the mortgagees, who never did prove. The executors could not have proved until 1869, when the mortgagees realized their security. If they had proved, their right of retainer would have been gone altogether. Stammers v. Elliott, 16 W. R. 489, L. R. 3 Ch. App. 195, and Armstrong v. Armstrong, 19 W. R. 971, L. R. 12 Eq. 614, are clear authorities for this. The same result would have followed if the bankrupt had obtained his discharge without the executors proving. In re Orpen, 29 W. R. 467, 16 Ch. D. 202, shows this. The case of In re Rees, which was cited in support of the contention that there is no right of retainer, is distinguishable, for there there had been proof.

It is contended that the executors have a right of proof only; but I can see no reason why they should hand over what they have belonging to the testator in order that they may get it back from the bankrupt's estate. In re Whitehouse, 36 W. R. 181, 37 Ch. D. 683 (p. 694, per Stirling, J.), is a clear authority against this contention. Lord Chelmsford, in Stammers v. Elliott, L. R. 3 Ch. 195, at p. 200, also lays this down clearly. The result is that the surviving executor has a right of retainer.

It was suggested that he might retain, on behalf of the estate of the deceased mother, the brother, and the sister, the sums contributed by them to keep down the interest and premiums; but there can be no right of retainer in respect of those sums. They did not come out of the testator's estate, and no debt is due to the testator's estate in respect of them. There is no equity by virtue of which executors can retain a debt due, not to the testator's estate, but to some other person, in order that they may hand over the amount retained to that person.

As to the £122 paid by the executors there is a clear right of retainer, as there is of the £578 deducted by the mortgagees from the proceeds of sale in satisfaction of their claim. I think this right of retainer carries with it the right to retain interest at 4 per cent. Although the interest reserved by the mortgage deed was 5 per cent., it does not follow that the surety ought to receive that rate in the absence of any contract as to interest. In Petre v. Duncombe a jury gave 5 per cent. interest to a surety by way of damages, but there the principal debtor had stated an account allowing interest at 5 per cent. on some previous payments. I think I ought to allow only 4 per cent. That is the rate of interest the court generally gives in such cases.

A claim has also been made to retain something in respect of consequential damage. That means, I assume, that the reversion when sold by the mortgagees did not realize its full value, and certainly not so much as it would have realized if they had waited till it fell into possession. No proof has been given of any consequential damage, and there can be no retainer in respect of it.

HILL v. PILCHER. (a.)

Settlement—Limited power to purchase land—Money "liable to be laid out in the purchase of land"—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), s. 33.

Under the trusts of a settlement by which the moiety of certain freehold lands and also certain personalty were settled, the trustees were authorized, at the request of the tenant for life, to invest the personalty in the purchase of the unsettled moiety of the freehold lands.

Held, that money in the hands of the trustees forming part of the personalty might be applied by the trustees under section 33 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, as capital moneys in the purchase, jointly with the owner of the other moiety, of adjoining convenient freeholds.

Adjourned summons.

Under the trusts of a marriage settlement the moiety of certain freehold premises was held by the trustees on trust for sale at the request of the tenant for life during her life, and afterwards, at their discretion and subject thereto, the said moiety, together with certain personal estate, was held by the trustees upon the usual trusts for the husband and wife and children.

The settlement also contained a provision that at the request in writing of the husband and wife, or the survivor of them, the trustees might sell any part of the securities vested in them upon the trusts of the settlement, and invest the same in the purchase of the other moiety of the freehold premises.

This was a summons to determine the question (amongst others) whether any portion of the trust funds was applicable under the Settled Land Act or otherwise for the purpose of purchasing, jointly with the owner of the other moiety of the property, a piece of land adjoining the freehold property settled which it appeared from the evidence was a most desirable addition to it.

Austen Cartmell, for the tenant for life.—Section 33 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, applies where there is money in the hands of trustees of a settlement liable to be laid out in land. Here the trustees are authorized to apply the money in hand in the purchase of the unsettled moiety of the freeholds. It is therefore within the section.

KEKEWICH, J.—The question for decision in this case is whether money which trustees of a settlement have power to invest in the purchase of particular land at the request of the tenant for life is or is not money which is "liable to be laid out in the purchase of land" within section 33 of the Settled Land Act, 1882. On this, the first question which arises is whether the power to purchase the unsettled moiety of the property settled is discretionary or obligatory. Where there is a direction or power to trustees to sell or purchase at the request of the tenant for life, the trustees must do so if required by the tenant for life, and consequently in this case upon the request being made a "liability" would arise to make the purchase. As to the further question, whether the power being to purchase particular land is this money within the meaning of the 33rd section of the Settled Land Act, I think that where a settlement contains provision for the investment of money in land so as to convert that money from personalty to realty the Act intends that such money should be capable of being applied as capital money for all the purposes of the Act, and accordingly the trustees may apply the money as desired in this case.

Re PANTHER LEAD CO. (a.)

Company—Winding up—Lease—Proof by lessor—Creditor—Insolvency of company.

Since the decision in Hardy v. Fothergill, 37 W. R. 177, 13 App. Cas. 351, the earlier cases as to proof by a lessor in the case of a company in liquidation have to be reconsidered, and it is the duty of the court to assist a lessor in proving in respect of the obligations of a company as lessee under its lease in all cases where the lessor is desirous of proving at once for his loss on the footing of the lease being determined or treated as determined.

A company which was lessee under an onerous lease went into voluntary liquidation, and the liquidator gave up possession to the lessors, but not so as to surrender the term; the lessors were ready to come to an arrangement by accepting a surrender or determining the lease on being allowed to prove for the loss thereby sustained.

Held, that liberty ought to be given to the liquidator to carry out such arrangement.

Summons.

This was a summons for directions which came before Romer, J., sitting as additional judge of the Chancery Division for Vaughan Williams, J.

The company was lessee under a lease, which contained onerous covenants, for a term of twenty-one years, commencing in 1883, and determinable at the end of seven and fourteen years.

The company, which was formed in 1857, went into voluntary liquidation in 1895, and the liquidator gave up possession to the lessors.

A question was raised on the present summons whether the lease had been surrendered, but his lordship held, on the facts, that there had been no surrender.

(a.) Reported by F. T. DUKA, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a) Reported by V. DE S. FOWKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The lessors had offered to arrange with the liquidator to take a surrender of the lease or to determine it, on their being allowed to prove for the loss thereby sustained by them.

This summons was taken out by the liquidator in the voluntary winding up to determine the question whether the lessors were entitled to prove in the winding up for the future and contingent liability of the company as regarded future rent and breaches of covenant, and whether the lessors were entitled to have the assets of the company impounded to answer their claims.

The main questions raised on the summons were (1) whether Hardy v. Fothergill, 37 W. R. 177, 13 App. Cas. 351, overrules the earlier cases on the same subject matter, such as Re Haytor Granite Co., 14 W. R. 186, L. R. 1 Ch. App. 77, and Horsey's claim, 16 W. R. 577, L. R. 5 Eq. 561; and (2) whether or not the present case was or was not distinguishable from The New Oriental Bank Corporation (No. 2), 43 W. R. 525, [1895] 1 Ch. 753.

The following is a statement of the previous law on the subject, taken from the cases cited in the argument:—

In the earlier cases—as, e.g., in Horsey's claim—it was decided that, as it was impossible to put a just estimate on the claim of a landlord for future rent and possible breaches of covenant, he was not entitled to prove against a limited company being wound up, and to receive a dividend on his proof.

This view would seem to have prevailed until Hardy v. Fothergill, which decided that a lessor's claim under a covenant for indemnity would be barred by an ordinary discharge in bankruptcy obtained by the assignee, even though the lessor have tendered no proof respecting it, for the contingent liability on the covenant is a debt provable in the bankruptcy, unless the court declares it to be a liability incapable of being fairly estimated. But the effect of Hardy v. Fothergill on the right of a lessor to have the assets of a limited company which is being wound up impounded remained undetermined till the case of The New Oriental Bank Corporation (2), though the point was mentioned in Craig's claim, 43 W. R. 245, [1895] 1 Ch. 267, before the Court of Appeal.

In The New Oriental Bank Corporation (2) Vaughan Williams, J., held that the rule in Hardy v. Fothergill does not apply where a lessor is proving in respect of the liability of his lessee under a subsisting lease, whether the lessee is an insolvent company which is being wound up or is a bankrupt, and that in the case of an insolvent company Re Haytor Granite Co. and Horsey's claim are still applicable.

Eve, Q.C., and J. G. Wood, for the application.

Buckley, Q.C., and P. S. Stokes, for the lessors.

Wood replied.

In addition to the cases mentioned above, the following cases and authorities were referred to: Gooch v. London Banking Association, 32 Ch. D. 41, 34 W. R. Dig. 38; Re Westbourne Grove Drapery Co., 25 W. R. 509, 5 Ch. D. 248; Northern Counties of England Fire Insurance Co., Macfarlane's claim, 17 Ch. D. 337, 29 W. R. Dig. 47; Companies Act, 1862, s. 158; Judicature Act, 1875, s. 10.

ROMER, J.—In this case I have already held that the lease to the company has not been surrendered by operation of law, and now the question arises as to what ought to be done in the winding up with regard to the claim of the lessors in respect of the lease. The lease is an onerous one. The premises are not occupied or used or required by the liquidator or by the company. If the liquidator can make a proper arrangement with the lessors whereby the lease may be determined, he certainly ought to do so. On the other hand, it is equally obvious that the terms of the lease are beneficial to the lessors, and that if the lease were put an end to without due compensation to the lessors they would suffer damage. Now, if this is the case, as in The New Oriental Bank Corporation (No. 2), before Vaughan Williams, J., and the lessors had refused to let the lease be given up and prove for the loss thereby sustained by them, I should have felt great difficulty in doing more than was done by the learned judge in that case, for a lessor cannot be compelled to come in and prove. But here the lessors offer to arrange with the liquidator to take a surrender of the lease or to determine it, on terms of their being allowed to prove for the loss thereby sustained by them. This is clearly an arrangement which ought to be made by the liquidator on his side, and after the expression of my opinion I have no doubt that he will enter into it, and so all difficulty will be avoided. All I need do, therefore, on this summons is to give liberty to the liquidator to carry out the arrangement I have indicated. Should, for any unforeseen reason, any difficulty arise, then a further application to the court can be made. The costs of both parties to this application will be paid by the liquidator out of the assets.

I desire to add that, in my opinion, since the decision in Hardy v. Fothergill the old cases as to proof by a lessor in the case of a company in liquidation have to be reconsidered, as was pointed out by Lindley, L.J., in Craig's claim, and certainly it will be the duty of the court to assist a lessor in proving in respect of the obligations of a company as lessee under its lease in all cases like the present, where the lessor is desirous of proving at once for his loss on the footing of the lease being determined or treated as determined. In such cases I see no difficulty in allowing the proof or estimating its amount. And I need not point out the injustice that would ensue if a liquidator in the case of an insolvent company like the present was to be at liberty to refuse to allow any proof except for rent actually accrued due. He might apply all the assets in paying the other creditors large dividends on their debts, and leave the unfortunate lessor with a mere claim for his future rent and in the position of there being no assets available for the payment of any part of such rent as and when it accrued due and became provable.

County court—Appeal—Claim not exceeding £20, but counter-claim exceeding £20—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 120.

Where in an action brought in a county court there is a counter-claim for a sum exceeding £20, there is a right of appeal in respect of the counter-claim, notwithstanding the claim itself was for a sum not exceeding £20.

(a.) Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal from a county court.

The action was to recover £3 11s. 6d., the cost of removing certain gas brackets put up by the defendant in the plaintiff's billiard-room, which were not suitable for the purpose for which they were required.

The defendant counter-claimed for £21 7s. 6d., the price of the aforesaid brackets.

Judgment was given in favour of the plaintiff on the claim and counter-claim.

Section 120 of the County Courts Act, 1888, provides that "if any party in any action or matter shall be dissatisfied with the determination or direction of the judge . . . the party aggrieved . . . may appeal from the same to the High Court . . .; provided always that there shall be no appeal in any action of contract or tort, other than an action of ejectment or an action in which title to any corporeal or incorporeal hereditament shall have come in question, where the debt or damages does not exceed twenty pounds. . . ."

The defendant appealed.

J. E. Bankes, for the appellant.

Buckmaster, for the respondent, took a preliminary objection. There is no right of appeal. Parties to a counter-claim are not "parties in any action or matter"; for "action" is defined, in section 186, to mean "every proceeding in the court which may be commenced as prescribed by plaint," and counter-claims are commenced, not by plaint, but by a notice. Therefore the circumstance that there is a counter-claim for a greater amount than £20 does not affect the rule that there is no appeal where the claim is for a less amount than £20. "Matter" refers only to the equitable jurisdiction of the court.

CAVE, J.—We do not think that there is anything in this preliminary point.

The case then proceeded.

OSBORNE v. CHOCQUEEL. (a.)

Animals—Negligence—Negligently keeping a ferocious dog—Scienter—Disposition to bite mankind.

Where a claim is made for injuries caused by a dog to a human being, the evidence of scienter must show not only that the dog had a ferocious disposition, but that it had a ferocious disposition against mankind. Proof, therefore, that the dog had worried a goat was not sufficient evidence of scienter to make the defendant liable.

Appeal from the decision of the judge at the Brompton County Court.

The plaintiff was bitten by the defendant's dog. The evidence of scienter was that while in the possession of a former owner the dog had, in company with another dog, chased and bitten a goat.

The learned judge gave judgment for the plaintiff with £22 damages.

Brook Little, for the defendant.—The evidence of scienter was insufficient. It was unreasonable to suggest that a dog that would bite a goat might not be perfectly docile with regard to men. The authorities showed that it was necessary to prove not only a ferocious disposition but a ferocious disposition against mankind: Bullen & Leake, Precedents of Pleadings, 3rd ed., p. 366; Applebee v. Percy, 22 W. R. 704, L. R. 9 C. P. 647; Worth v. Gilling, L. R. 2 C. P. 1, 15 W. R. C. L. Dig. 75.

Hawtin, for the plaintiff.—The question of the ferocious disposition of the dog is a question of fact. All that is required to be shown is a ferocious disposition, from which ferocity towards men may be inferred: Smith v. Great Eastern Railway Co., 15 W. R. 131, L. R. 2 C. P. 4.

Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—The appeal must be allowed. The facts of the case are these. The dog was a bull-dog, and was formerly owned by a Dr. Roberts. Its only misdeed was that while in Dr. Roberts' possession it worried a goat at Wormwood Scrubs. In September, 1895, Dr. Roberts made it over to the defendant. In November the defendant was leading the dog by a leash, and the plaintiff with other boys began teasing it. When upon reaching home the dog was released it went back to the plaintiff and bit him. There was no evidence that the dog had manifested any disposition to bite mankind. It had a creditable record with the exception of the unhappy incident in connection with the goat. The question is, What is the test of the defendant's liability?

I think the law is in an unsatisfactory condition. It would be much more intelligible if a man were to be responsible for whatever damage his dog did. The law has so dealt with the matter in a particular class of case. That is to say, that if a dog kills or injures sheep or cattle the owner is liable, notwithstanding the dog had never to his knowledge shown a disposition to injure sheep or cattle before. Attempts have been made to abolish the necessity for proving scienter, but they have failed. A Bill on the subject which was introduced into Parliament did not receive support.

But looking at the law as it stands it is impossible to arrive at any other conclusion than that where a dog has injured a human being, in order to establish liability on the part of the owner it is necessary to prove scienter, that the dog was accustomed either to bite or bite at mankind.

The learned judge has not found that the dog had any ferocious disposition against mankind or that it ever attempted to bite mankind. All that he has found is that the dog was of a ferocious disposition. The learned judge was therefore wrong.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. For a great number of years it was always the practice in pleadings to describe the dog as not merely of a ferocious disposition, but that it was accustomed to bite mankind. In Worth v. Gilling an amendment to that effect was added at nisi prius. When pleading was more strict there could be no better definition of the law than could be found in the necessary allegations to support a claim.

In Hartley v. Harriman, 1 B. & Ald. 620, it was held that a declaration that the defendant's dogs had a disposition to attack sheep was not supported by proof that the dogs frequently attacked men.

Neither is it to be taken as a necessary inference that because a dog is accustomed to attack sheep that it is ipso facto shown to be liable to attack men. It is well known that a dog may have a disposition to attack any sort of animal, and yet be perfectly good as regards mankind. Therefore the fact that this dog worried a goat is no evidence of a ferocious disposition as regards mankind.

BASSANO v. BRADLEY. (a.)

Practice -- County Court — Jurisdiction — Proceeding under Charitable Trusts Act, 1853—Title—Rent-charge issuing out of lands—Annual value—Charitable Trusts Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 139), s. 41—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 60.

An action by trustees of a charity to recover arrears of a rent-charge is not a "proceeding" within section 41 of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853.

The plaintiffs sought to recover in the county court arrears of a rent-charge of £10 a year issuing out of lands of an annual value of more than £50.

Held, that there was no dispute as to the title of the lands, but only as to the rent-charge, and that the jurisdiction of the county court was not ousted.

Rule nisi for a prohibition to the county court of Worcester.

The action was brought by the plaintiffs, who were the trustees of a charity, to recover the arrears of a rent-charge of £10 issuing out of lands of the defendants which were admittedly of more value than £50 a year. The summons referred to the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853, and leave to proceed under that Act had been obtained.

The defendants obtained a rule nisi for a prohibition on the grounds that the jurisdiction of the county court was excluded (1) by section 41 of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853; (2) by section 60 of the County Courts Act, 1888. Section 41 of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853, provides that "no judge of the Court of Chancery nor any district court of bankruptcy or county court shall upon any proceedings under this Act have jurisdiction to try or determine the title at law or in equity to any real or personal property or any term or interest therein as between any charity or the trustee thereof and any person holding or claiming such real or personal property, term, or interest adversely to such charity, or to try or determine any question as to the existence or extent of any charge or trust."

The County Courts Act, 1888, s. 60, enacts that "a judge shall have jurisdiction to try any action in which the title to any corporeal or incorporeal hereditament shall come in question where neither the value of the lands, tenements, or hereditaments in dispute, nor the rent payable in respect thereof, shall exceed the sum of £50 by the year. . . ."

Bosanquet, Q.C., and Hickey, for the plaintiffs, showed cause against the rule.—This is not a "proceeding" under the Charitable Trusts Act; although the leave of the Charity Commissioners has been obtained, it was not really necessary. Secondly, there is no question here in which the title to lands of a greater annual value than £50 is in dispute. The rent-charge of £10 is the hereditament as to the title of which there is a question. There is nothing in section 60 of the County Courts Act, 1888, to prevent a county court judge trying an action as to a rent-charge of less than £50 a year, even though the lands out of which it issues exceed £50 in annual value: Stolworthy v. Powell, 55 L. J. Q. B. 228, 34 W. R. Dig. 51.

A. T. Lawrence, for the defendants.—The plaintiffs intended to proceed under the Charitable Trusts Act, as is shown by their obtaining the leave of the Charity Commissioners. Section 41 of that Act therefore acts as a bar to the action. But, even if that is not so, the jurisdiction of the county court judge is ousted by section 60 of the County Courts Act. The defendants deny that their land, which is of a greater annual value than £50, is subject to this rent-charge. The question is one relating to the title not only of the rent-charge but also of the land out of which it issues. The decision of this case must affect the title of the defendant's land.

LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—With regard to the first point we are clearly of opinion that the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853, has no application to this case, although no doubt some warrant is given to the defendants' contention by the fact that the plaint refers to the Act, and also because the plaintiffs took the trouble to get the consent of the Charity Commissioners, which was not necessary if the action was not within the Act. The application therefore fails on that ground.

The second point turns on the construction of section 60 of the County Courts Act, 1888. I am not satisfied in my own mind that we have arrived at the true construction of that section. On the other hand, the onus lies on the defendants to satisfy us that the county court has no jurisdiction, and I am not able to arrive at the conclusion that they have done so. The words of the section are: "A judge shall have jurisdiction to try any action in which the title to any corporeal or incorporeal hereditament shall come in question." Up to that point the case is clearly within the words, for this is a case of an incorporeal hereditament. The section proceeds: "where neither the value of the lands, tenements, or hereditaments in dispute, nor the rent payable in respect thereof, shall exceed the sum of £50 by the year." It is to be observed that the words "rent payable in respect thereof" cannot be read in connection with the words "incorporeal hereditaments," for it is not possible to conceive a case of rent of an incorporeal hereditament. We are therefore thrown back on the earlier words, "where neither the value of the lands, tenements, or hereditaments in dispute" shall exceed £50 a year. I am unable to accept Mr. Lawrence's view as to the construction of the section. The dispute in this case is as to the plaintiffs' right to an incorporeal hereditament of the yearly value of £10 issuing out of certain lands. There is no dispute as to the defendants' title to those lands; the dispute is as to the title to the incorporeal hereditament issuing out of the lands. Under these circumstances I think that the prohibition ought not to go. With regard to the case which was referred to in the argument, Stolworthy v. Powell, I will only say that if a case similar to that comes before me I should like to further consider the point there decided.

Re MONNIER (VEUVE) ET SES FILS (LIMITED). Ex parte BLOOMENTHAL. (a.)

Company — Winding up — Contributory — Certificate — "Fully paid" shares — Estoppel — Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), s. 25.

A holder of shares in a company cannot relieve himself of his liability under section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, by alleging estoppel on the ground that the company gave him a certificate representing that the shares were fully paid up, if the circumstances were such that he must have known that no cash had been paid for the shares.

The appellant was the registered holder of 16,000 shares, in respect of which he had received certificates that they were fully paid up. He had paid no cash for the shares, and knew that the shares belonged to the company; no contract under section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, had been registered before the issue of the shares.

Held, that, as under the circumstances of the case he must have known that nothing had been paid for the shares, he was liable to be put on the list of contributories for the full amount.

This was an appeal by F. Bloomenthal from an order of Vaughan Williams, J., treating him as a registered shareholder of the company. The facts were as follow.

Bloomenthal, who did the company's printing, was asked in February, 1894, to lend them £1,000. The company gave an acceptance for the amount, and deposited with him 10,000 £1 fully paid-up preference shares as an additional security for the loan. Subsequently, in April, 1894, a further advance of £600 was made by him to the company on similar terms, and similarly secured by an additional 6,000 £1 shares. Bloomenthal was registered as the holder of the whole 16,000 shares, and received certificates in respect of them from the company in the following form: "This is to certify that Frederic Bloomenthal is the registered proprietor of 1,000 7 per cent. cumulative preference shares of £1 each, numbered —— to ——, both inclusive, in Veuve Monnier et ses Fils, Limited, subject to the articles of association, and that on each of such shares the full amount has been paid." It was also part of the arrangement that, if the company should wish at any time to pay off any part of the loan, the shares were to be returned at the same rate at which they were taken; and as a matter of fact, in December, 1894, the company sold 200 shares by auction, Bloomenthal executing a transfer of the shares and receiving £20 in part payment of the loan. No cash had ever been paid for the shares, nor had any contract been registered under section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867. It was also proved that Bloomenthal knew that the 16,000 shares which formed part of his security were portion of an issue of 40,000 shares which had not been well subscribed for by the public. The company went into liquidation in December, 1895.

In January, 1896, Bloomenthal took proceedings to have his name removed from the register. An order was, however, made for the compulsory winding up of the company before his motion could be heard, and he was placed on the list of contributories for the full amount of the shares standing in his name. He thereupon took out a summons in the winding up to have his name removed from the list of contributories.

Vaughan Williams, J., refused the application, on the ground that Bloomenthal had agreed to become a member of the company to secure his loan, and though he doubtless believed he was incurring no liability, yet, according to his lordship's view of the evidence, he knew that the £16,000 was not actually paid, and that he was an allottee of the shares. Bloomenthal appealed.

Astbury, Q.C., and Mark Romer, for the appellant.—The appellant got a certificate representing that the shares were fully paid up, and acted on the faith of that representation. The liquidator is equivalent to the company, and is therefore estopped from denying now that these shares were fully paid up: Burkinshaw v. Nicolls, 26 W. R. 819, 3 App. Cas. 1004. There was no contract that the appellant should be a shareholding member of this company, and the appellant never had any beneficial dominion over these shares. 200 were actually sold while he held them. The position of the appellant is that the shares were placed in his name for security, and he supposed that section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, had been complied with long before he took these shares. Sandy's case, 37 W. R. 531,, 42 Ch. D. 98, turned on knowledge and representation. The evidence shows that the appellant repudiated before the petition to wind up was presented.

They also referred to Waterhouse v. Jamieson, L. R. 2 H. L. Sc. 29, 18 W. R. H. L. Dig. 8; Beck's case, 22 W. R. 348, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 392; Western of Canada Oil, Lands, and Works Co. v. Walker, 24 W. R. 165, 1 Ch. D. 115; British Farmers' Pure Linseed Co., 26 W. R. 334, 7 Ch. D. 533; Ooregum Gold Mining Co. v. Roper, 41 W. R. 90, [1892] A. C. 125; Parbury's case, ante, p. 107, [1896] 1 Ch. 100.

Eve, Q.C., and Martelli, contra.—The appellant knew that he was the registered propietor of these shares. Therefore, apart from any question of contract, he became liable for the statutory liability. Our proposition is that he was put on inquiry. He knew that the company had failed to get these shares subscribed for. He was on the register and holding shares, and if he says now that the shares were fully paid up; he must show grounds for that belief. He admits that he knew that the shares belonged to the company. It is impossible, therefore, that he could have believed that they had been paid for by anybody. There was no repudiation till the winding-up petition had been presented. All that the appellant meant by saying that he believed the shares to have been fully paid up, was that he believed there was no further laibility on them.

Astbury, Q.C., in reply.—The appellant must have had actual knowledge that nothing had been paid for the shares, not merely constructive knowledge, if he is to be made a contributory. [RIGBY, L.J., referred to Addison's case, 18 W. R. 365, L. R. 5 Ch. App. 294.]

LINDLEY, L.J., after stating the facts, said:—Whether it was contemplated at the time of the loan that these shares should be registered in Mr. Bloomenthal's name or not does not seem to be clear. I see no evidence to show that it was part of the bargain that they should be registered in his name; but they were registered in his name, both as to the original 10,000 and the subsequent 6,000, and he received certificates from the secretary of the company which are very important. I will read one of them. [His lordship read the certificate, and continued:—] Now, that informs him of two things.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It informs him, first, that he has been registered in respect of those shares; and secondly, that on each of such shares the full amount has been paid. The first statement was true, the second statement was not true. Well, what was done was this. Knowing that he had been so registered, he did not in any way object to it. When the 6,000 shares are pledged to him as security for the further advance of £600, he receives further certificates in the same form, again informing him that he is on the register with respect to those shares; and what is very important with reference to one part of this case, is this: When the company require him, as they afterwards did in November, to transfer some of these shares to them to enable them to borrow money and repay him some of his advances, he executes transfers of these shares as a shareholder.

Pausing there for a moment, that last fact satisfies me that this case cannot be brought within the principle of Beck's case, on which Mr. Astbury relied. In Beck's case the man had been put on the register without any authority at all, and the only question, as James, L.J., said, was whether there was anything to prevent him from denying that he was a shareholder. There was absolutely nothing there, positively nothing. But here there is. There is the assertion by him, or the exercise by him, of his rights as a registered shareholder, by transferring some of the shares which were put into his name, and which were standing in his name with his knowledge and without any disapproval on his part. It appears to me, therefore, that it is impossible for him to say, as Beck said, "I am not a shareholder in this company." Such cases as Sandy's case and others are conclusive to my mind to show that he is a registered shareholder in respect of these shares, and he cannot get out of that position. Neither would he care to get out of it if the shares were what they are represented to be—namely, fully paid up.

But I pass from the first step, which I think is absolutely clear, to the second step, which is the really important and difficult one—whether he can say to the company, "You are estopped from requiring me to pay upon these shares because of your statement, on the faith of which I acted, that on each of the shares put into my name the full amount had been paid." Now, if this gentleman were in a position to avail himself of the equitable doctrine that he is a bonâ fide purchaser for value of these shares without notice of the truth—if that were really his position—I should be of opinion that he could say to the company, "You are estopped from denying that statement, and, although I am a shareholder, I am not liable to pay calls on those shares, because you have admitted yourself that they were fully paid up." That brings us to the question, which is the really difficult question in this case—the question of fact. That a bonâ fide holder for value of shares which purport to be paid up, without knowing that they are not paid up, is not liable to calls was settled in the Scotch case of Waterhouse v. Jamieson, and again in Burkinshaw v. Nicolls; and, although those were cases of transfers, I am of opinion that the doctrine is not necessarily confined to transfers, but may be extended to the case of an allottee. Parbury's case is an instance in point. In Parbury's case Parbury was an allottee from the company. He had paid a person the full amount of those shares in order that that person might pay the same to the company and procure for Parbury a proper certificate. The person (Wright) who received the money, and who was connected with the company, misapplied the money; but the company gave Parbury a certificate that they had received his money and that his shares were paid up in full, although, in truth, that was not the case. It appears to me that the doctrine sanctioned by the House of Lords twice over, in Waterhouse v. Jamieson and in Burkinshaw v. Nicolls, was properly applied to Parbury's case, although he was an allottee and not a transferee. He had every reason to suppose that the statement made by the company to him was true, and he had no reason to doubt that they had received his money, although in fact they had not.

Now, can Mr. Bloomenthal bring his case within that principle? Mr. Astbury has struggled very hard to satisfy us that he can. The case is put in the shortest possible way thus. Mr. Astbury says: "These certificates, which told me that I was the registered shareholder, told me in so many words that on each of such shares the full amount had been paid, and I had no suspicion that that was not true." That is the strongest way of putting it. Now, we have to investigate that. What did Mr. Bloomenthal know? It appears to me that he knew so much that if he had taken the trouble to investigate what he knew he would have realized the fact that these shares could not have been fully paid up; in other words, he knew facts which showed that that statement was untrue, although I believe him perfectly when he said that he did not think about the matter and did not see the consequences of what he was doing. Now, what he knew, unfortunately for him, was this. He knew, first of all, that the shares were the company's shares. It was part of the bargain that they should be the company's shares and should be pledged to him by the company for the debt of the company, and that he should hold them for the company, subject, of course, to the repayment of his debt. He knew that he did not pay for them. Now, it appears to me that, knowing these two things, he had all the facts necessary to show anybody who put them together and thought about the matter at all, that this statement could not have been true. It was suggested that, for anything he knew to the contrary, these shares might have been Mr. Austin's, the company's secretary, or somebody else's, and that he might be the nominee of Austin, or whoever the other person was. It appears to me that the nature of the transaction excludes the possibility of any such suggestion as that, and I think, although at first I doubted it, that Williams, J., was right when he came to the conclusion he did, as a matter of fact, that "Mr. Bloomenthal did not think for one moment that the £10,000 had been actually paid. That was not his notion. He knew perfectly well that the £10,000 was not actually paid. He knew perfectly well that he was allottee of the shares." I believe that is true, though it must be qualified with this, though I am afraid the qualification cannot assist Mr. Bloomenthal, he did not think it out. It is not that he did not know, but that he did not think it out, and he has unwarily fallen into a pit from which the ingenuity of his counsel, backed as it is by the desire of the court, cannot extricate him. I think the appeal must be dismissed, and dismissed with costs.

LOPES, L.J.—In this case Mr. Bloomenthal is on the register for 16,000 shares, and he desires to be relieved from the liability attaching to his position as a registered shareholder. Now, I do not hesitate to say that this is a very hard case, and, speaking for myself, I have struggled, so far as I have been able, to exonerate him from the terrible liability which he has brought on himself. There can be no doubt of this, that he is a registered shareholder; and I can have no doubt that he perfectly well knew that he was. But then what he relies on and what is urged by counsel on his behalf is this, he relies on estoppel. How far he can rely on that, in my judgment, depends on a question of fact, that question being what he really did know. If he did not know and had no reason to know that these shares were not fully paid up, the certificates to which reference has been made, which state in the clearest language that the shares were fully paid up, would estop the liquidator and would prevent his setting up the truth; but if, on the other hand, he knew or ought to have known that those shares were not fully paid up, the estoppel would be unavailing. Now, I cannot doubt that he knew as a fact that these shares were not fully paid up shares. He knew and must have known that he had not paid for them. He knew and must have known that there had been no transfer to him of those shares, and he knew that the public, to whom those shares had been offered, had not taken them up. Moreover, and that I think is more important than anything else, he said he knew the shares belonged to the company. Now, how is that consistent with his believing the shares to be fully paid up? I cannot but come to the conclusion that he knew or had reason to know, or ought to have known, that they were not fully paid up. In my judgment he knew, as a fact, that they were not fully paid up, but he did not know the effect of that knowledge on his liability. I think the appeal must be dismissed.

RIGBY, L.J.—I regret to feel myself constrained to agree with the judgment that has been already pronounced by the Lords Justices. I say so because I think this was a case in which none of the parties concerned, for a moment thought that so serious a responsibility was being put upon Mr. Astbury's client. But we have to deal with a code contained in Acts of Parliament, and, although there are many advantages in a code, there are some disadvantages. There are cases in which it might be advantageous to introduce modifications which we cannot find in the code itself; but, if such cases do occur, our duty is to obey the directions given by the Legislature; we have no other duty at all. Now, I assume without hesitation in favour of Mr. Astbury's client that he never understood or believed for a moment that he was incurring this liability; but he had the great indiscretion to deal to a large amount in matters about which he knew very little, in matters in which his own opinion as to the legal effect of what he was doing was of no importance; but the question is what he did and what was in his mind. Now, assuming that, although he was an allottee and not a transferee, he would be entitled to the benefit of the doctrine that a bonâ fide purchaser without notice (and I include a mortgagee in that description) is entitled to rely on a positive statement made to him by the company, which he had not the means of knowing to be inaccurate in the important sense in which it was supposed to have been made; he is entitled to that, if he can show that he was in truth a purchaser for value without notice. I assume also in his favour he was not put upon inquiry. It was not a question of constructive notice, but of direct and positive notice, which to a reasonable man ought to have been sufficient to bring him to the conclusion that the statement made in the certificates, that the shares were fully paid up, was not made in the sense that cash had passed from any person to the company to the extent of £1 per share; but that it was made only in the sense that the company were content to treat them as I believe they did intend to treat them. I have no reason to believe to the contrary, and therefore I do not assume any proposition such as that there was a deliberate attempt at cheating, because I think he could only believe it in the sense that they were content to treat them as fully paid-up shares.

Now, it clear when we put together the facts—which, unfortunately for this gentleman, he was incapable of putting together for the purpose of deriving a correct legal conclusion from them—that he knew the position, for he had conversed with the secretary of the company on the question, and I cannot suppose that this conversation had passed from his mind at the time. He knew that the 40,000 preference shares, of which the 16,000 in question here formed part, had been offered to the public and to a great extent offered in vain. He knew therefore that of that 40,000 a considerable portion remained with the company. They had not been issued and therefore were not in a proper sense shares, but they formed part of the capital of the company capable of being issued, and he knew that they remained with the company in that sense. He bargained with the company, in plain language, that he would have a portion of that capital placed at his disposal, as security for the promissory notes or bills of exchange that they gave for the moneys advanced; and that the company, and the company alone, subject to his security, were to have the disposal of those shares, and be in fact the owners of those shares. All that he knew, and, as has been pointed out by Lindley, L.J., there can be no doubt that he also knew, and knew as a matter of substantial knowledge, that he was the registered owner. He was told so by the very certificate on which he relies, as containing the statement which he seeks now to make, through his counsel, an estoppel. But not only that. There were two stages of the transaction and a third final dealing when he was called on to retransfer, and did retransfer, in pursuance of his agreement to do so, some of these shares. Now, all that he knew. He knew also that not a farthing of cash had passed from himself to the company in the way of payment of the capital that could be called up on those shares. He knew also—I say he knew, and he must have known it, all the circumstances of the case pointed it out to him—that no one had paid it. The theory that someone else might possibly have paid and so become the owner of the shares is met by the unfortunate fact that he knew there was no owner other than the company, and therefore no one could have paid them. I say therefore, unhappily for him, he did know that the shares were not fully paid up in the only sense that could have availed him; that is to say, he knew there was no person in existence who could have paid the company £1 per share, or, indeed, any sum whatever per share, so as to make them fully paid-up shares; and I can only reconcile, as I most willingly do, his evidence on the point by assuming, as the learned judge appears to have done, that when he said, "I had not a suspicion they were not fully paid up," he was speaking quite honestly. He had not a suspicion that they were not at law so fully paid up as to entitle him to be registered as the owner without any demand being made upon him. I do not think there is any sign at all that this gentleman tried to say anything that was not quite right. I fully accept that view. I think he is most unfortunately situated. It is a pity that a man should have undertaken so serious a matter as allowing himself to be registered, as undoubtedly he did, as the owner of 16,000 shares which he must have known were not certainly worth the full amount of £1 per share, and that he should have undertaken to do so without seeking advice which would at once have told him, "The very facts you put before us prove that these are not fully paid-up shares"; and the facts which Mr. Astbury himself has told us prove that he cannot rely on an estoppel.

Appeal dismissed.

Building estate—Building scheme—Restrictive covenants—Right to enforce covenants—Acquiescence in breach—Change in character of property.

A person who, by virtue of a building scheme, has a right to enforce a covenant prohibiting the carrying on of a trade or business upon certain land may lose that right by acquiescing in systematic breaches of the covenant, or by a total change in the character of the building estate. But the fact that on a part of the building estate remote from the plaintiff's property businesses have been carried on in breach of the covenant is not, unless it appears that the plaintiff knew of what was being done, proof of acquiescence by him; and a change in the character of the property must, to deprive the plaintiff of his right, be so complete as to make the object for which the covenant was imposed impossible of attainment.

Held, upon the facts of the particular case, that the plaintiff had not lost his right.

Appeal from Romer, J.

In May, 1852, the Cottenham Park Estate, a freehold estate of over two hundred acres, at Wimbledon, was bought by one Finch, who laid it out in accordance with a building scheme for the erection of dwelling-houses of a superior class, and put it up in lots for sale by public auction. The particulars and conditions of sale required each purchaser to enter into a covenant with the vendor, his heirs, appointees, and assigns, not to permit or suffer any trade or business whatsoever to be set up or carried on in or upon any of the lots, or any taverns, hotels, tea-gardens, lunatic asylums, beershops, or shops of any kind to be opened, or goods or wares to be exposed for sale, on any part of the land sold to him (with an exception as to certain lots about which no question arose).

At the auction, in November, 1852, one W. G. Smith bought the lots numbered 47 and 48, which were duly conveyed to him in December, 1852. The deed of conveyance recited that the purchase was subject to the conditions of sale, and that these provided for the purchaser entering into such covenant with the vendor as was after expressed in the said deed. The covenant actually entered into, however, only bound the purchaser not to permit any trade, &c., "without the consent in writing" of the vendor, his heirs, appointees, or assigns. The plaintiff Knight afterwards, with notice of the original conditions and particulars of sale, and of the conveyance to Smith, purchased part of lot 49 from one Trist, to whom Smith had sold it.

The other purchasers at the auction, and Messrs. Buckle & Philps, the purchasers by private contract of the part of the estate not sold at the auction, entered into absolute covenants in accordance with the original conditions. Buckle & Philps then laid out their purchase according to a new building scheme, dividing it into smaller lots. The covenant required of each purchaser under this sub-scheme was contained in a deed of covenant dated the 14th of June, 1853, and provided that he should not, on the land bought by him, carry on, or permit or suffer to be carried on, a tavern, hotel, tea-garden, lunatic asylum, or beer-shop, or any other shop, nor expose or permit to be exposed for sale any goods or wares, and should not carry on, or make or permit or suffer to be carried on, any trade or business which should be noisy, noxious, dangerous, or offensive to the neighbourhood or to the neighbouring owners or occupiers, or which should be in any wise injurious to the land subject to the sub-scheme.

The defendant, in 1893, bought his land, which was part of the land comprised in the sub-scheme, with notice both of Buckle & Philps's covenant and of the deed of covenant of June, 1853. His predecessor in title had bought of Buckle & Philps in 1853, with notice of their covenant, and had executed the deed of June, 1853.

The defendant shortly after his purchase began to erect on his land a building which he intended to use as a laundry. Notwithstanding notice from the plaintiffs that they should object to the building as a breach of the covenant, he completed it, and he was now carrying on there the business of a laundryman. He had not obtained such consent to the carrying on of any trade or business as was required by the covenant in the conveyance to Smith of December, 1852; and it was admitted at the trial that he had bought with notice of that covenant, and also of the original conditions of sale.

The plaintiffs commenced this action to restrain the defendant from carrying on any business on the land purchased by him, and from committing other alleged breaches of covenant.

On the 22nd of February, 1896, Romer, J., decided that the plaintiff Knight was, but the other plaintiffs were not, entitled to an injunction against the carrying on of any business on the premises, and refused the other relief sought.

The defendant appealed.

Eve, Q.C., and E. C. Macnaghten, for the appellant, cited Sayers v. Collyer, 33 W. R. 91, 28 Ch. D. 103; German v. Chapman, 26 W. R. 149, 7 Ch. D. 271; and Duke of Bedford v. Trustees of the British Museum, 2 My. & K. 552. They contended that the plaintiff Knight had acquiesced in the carrying on upon the property of various trades, particularly laundry businesses; and, further, that the whole character of the property had been changed, so that the estate had ceased to be residential, and that the covenant against carrying on business, &c., was no longer binding.

Astbury, Q.C., and R. M. Bray, for the respondent, were not called upon.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I think the judgment of the learned judge is quite correct. [His lordship stated the facts, and proceeded:—] The defendant has begun to carry on business as a laundryman, and his defence is that this is not a proper case of restrictive covenant, because the nature and character of the property has been altered. The facts appear to be these. Romer, J., has found that it is not true to say that the character of this property has been changed. All the houses are and have been used for residential purposes, but at some corner of the property bought from Buckle & Philps people who have bought places which look like residences have more or less carried on business therein. Romer, J., has found some facts as to that which I think of importance, and therefore I will refer to that part of his judgment; for, having attended carefully to the argument, I cannot see the slightest reason for disagreeing with the learned judge, and therefore I shall read part of his judgment (as reported [1896] 1 Ch. 653, 662): "The defendant contends that the estate has so changed from its original residential character, and that the original scheme has been so departed from on this part of the estate, that it would be inequitable now to enforce the scheme and original covenants as against the defendant. And further, he contends that, in any case, so many businesses (especially laundry businesses) have been carried on upon this part of the estate, and for so long a time, that the plaintiff ought to be now held precluded by acquiescence or otherwise from any right he might otherwise have had to restrain him. In my opinion, on the evidence, the defendant fails to establish any such case as would enable the court to uphold either of these contentions. Notwithstanding the evidence of several of the defendant's witnesses, I am satisfied that this part of the estate, like the rest of it, has continued to be and is still practically a residential one. Nor has the original scheme been so departed from as to render it inequitable that it should now be enforced at the instance of the plaintiff Knight. All the houses have been built as private houses. Looking at them from the exterior they all appear to be, and to be used as, private residences only. In no case before this action was brought was there any outward or visible sign on or about the premises to call the attention of any passer-by, or of the plaintiff Knight, to the fact that any of them were used except as private houses." Then he goes on (p. 664): "Such breaches of the scheme and covenants as there were by reason of these laundry businesses were done secretly as far as concerns the general landowners and residents entitled to enforce the covenants, including the plaintiff Knight. Not only did these landowners and residents not acquiesce in any breach of the scheme and covenants; but there is abundant evidence before me of their care in enforcing them whenever a breach was threatened or committed to their knowledge." He also says: "I am satisfied that the general landowners and residents, including Knight, were not aware that any breach was being committed which could be proved or stopped."

(a.) Reported by R. C. MACKENZIE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law

In these circumstances I should have thought that the case was a tolerably plain one; but the argument on behalf of the appellant has induced me to look into the authorities on this subject, which I had not for some time had opportunity or occasion to consider. I will state the result of those authorities as I understand them. These covenants do not at law run with the land. Here the breaches were undisputed, but the defence to the action was change in the character of the neighbourhood and acquiescence. When a court of equity is asked to enforce a covenant by decreeing specific performance or granting an injunction—in other words, when equitable as distinguished from legal relief is sought—equitable as distinguished from legal defences have to be considered. The conduct of the plaintiff may disentitle him from relief; his acquiescence in what he complains of, or his delay in seeking relief, may of itself be sufficient to preclude him from obtaining it. Sayers v. Collyer and Roper v. Williams, T. & Russ. 18, illustrate this. In both of those cases the court refused to enforce restrictive covenants at the instance of the particular plaintiffs. But, further, before granting equitable relief, courts of equity look not only to the words of a covenant, but to the object to attain which it was entered into; and if, owing to circumstances which have occurred since it was entered into, such object cannot be attained, equitable relief will be refused. This doctrine was laid down and acted upon by Lord Eldon and Sir Thomas Plumer in Duke of Bedford v. Trustees of the British Museum, by Woods, V.C., in Peek v. Matthews, 15 W. R. 689, L. R. 3 Eq. 515, and was recognized in German v. Chapman. It is upon this ground that restrictive covenants intended to preserve the character of land to be laid out and used in a particular way will not be enforced if such land has already been so laid out or used that its preservation as intended is no longer possible. Such state of things can seldom (if ever) have arisen except from a departure from the scheme by the vendor and purchasers from him or from the acquiescence or laches of those entitled to enforce the observance of the covenants in question; but, whatever the explanation of the altered state of things may be, if the object to be attained by the covenant cannot be attained, equitable relief to enforce it will be refused. Nor do I understand the observations of Bowen and Fry, L.JJ., to be opposed to this view of the law. Their object evidently was not to discredit the cases I have referred to, but rather to guard against a loose application of the principle on which they proceed. Some expressions of Lord Eldon in Roper v. Williams and Duke of Bedford v. Trustees of the British Museum led to the notion that if a restrictive covenant for the preservation of building estate was not enforced in all cases, it could not be enforced in equity in any. But this notion was emphatically protested against by the Court of Appeal in German v. Chapman, and its error had been previously pointed out by Wood, V.C., in Mitchell v. Steward, 14 W. R. 453, L. R. 1 Eq. 541, 547. The evidence in the present case shows that, except in a few instances of no real importance, the restrictive covenants entered into with the vendor when the property was sold in lots for building purposes have always been observed. There has been no departure worth mentioning from the scheme originally adopted. The case, therefore, falls within German v. Chapman, and not within Duke of Bedford v. Trustees of the British Museum and Peek v. Matthews. The facts as found by Romer, J., are clearly warranted by the evidence, and no grounds have been shown to disentitle the plaintiff from the relief which he sought, and which he has obtained. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It appears to me that the law is correctly laid down in German v. Chapman. The learned judge has found, and I think rightly, that the defendant is bound to establish that the nature of the property has been so substantially changed that the object of the covenant was to be considered at an end. The learned judge has found, on the contrary, that it was not so changed. In those circumstances this case must be governed by German v. Chapman, and therefore the appeal fails. I would only add that, looking at the evidence, I entirely agree with the learned judge's view, and on that evidence I should find the same way as he has done.

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and shall add one or two observations, because the case is one of some importance. [His lordship stated the facts, and proceeded:—] Those covenants having been imposed for the purpose of keeping the whole of this property as a residential property, they were covenants to carry out a building scheme, and therefore in equity were to be considered as covenants entered into for the benefit of each of the several purchasers of lots in this building estate. Accordingly each of the purchasers has a right in equity, though not at law, to enforce those covenants against the purchaser of any other lot, and it is just the same thing in equity as though the defendant, or rather his predecessor in title, had entered into that covenant with the predecessors in title of the plaintiffs directly. Two answers are made to the action. First, it is said that the plaintiffs have disentitled themselves from bringing it, because they have acquiesced in a laundry business being carried on, not indeed on this particular plot of land, but somewhere on the estate; and, secondly, that even if they had a title to bring the action, still the character of the whole property has been so changed that it is no longer a residential property, but is a property on which one may carry on such a business as this. I am not going into the facts, but I agree entirely with the findings of the learned judge. In the first place, I think the plaintiff never had acquiesced; and in the second, the property had not been so far altered in character that it had ceased to be a residential estate and that the plaintiffs had lost their right to enforce this covenant. The defendant is in the same position in equity as if his predecessor in title had entered into a direct covenant with the plaintiffs not to carry on any trade or business. The alteration in the character of the property must be a very considerable one indeed if it prevents the plaintiffs from enforcing in equity that covenant to the benefit of which they are entitled. It is obvious that a trade might be carried on in some remote part of the estate without doing these plaintiffs any injury whatever; and if it be said that they are to lose their right to sue unless they at once put a stop to that trade, although the infringement did them no kind of damage, the benefit of the covenant would be lost entirely. I should hesitate very much indeed before I came to the conclusion that one such instance of infringement was enough to disentitle the plaintiffs to maintain this action. In a building estate of this size a man in the position of one of the plaintiffs might very well know nothing of such an incident as I have mentioned; and I cannot think the fact that he did nothing to stop that would prevent him from taking proceedings against a man who should carry on the same trade in such proximity to his house as to do him probably a great amount of damage.

I think the appeal entirely fails, and must be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

GRIFFITH v. THOMPSON. (a.)

Will — Absolute gift — Condition subsequent — Repugnancy.

A testator gave all his property, real and personal, to trustees for division among his children, their shares to be paid when they respectively attained twenty-eight. The will further contained a clause cutting down the children's shares to £1,000 each in the case of sons, and to £500 in the case of daughters, if any of them should embrace a religious life.

Held, following Saunders v. Vautier, Cr. & Ph. 240, that there was an absolute gift to the children vesting on the testator's death, and the provision as to payment at twenty-eight was nugatory; and that the clause as to embracing a religious life was a condition repugnant to the former gift, and must be disregarded.

Adjourned summons.

Edward Thompson, by his will, dated the 10th of November, 1868, after directing certain annuities to be paid, gave all his property, real and personal, to his trustees upon trust "to divide and distribute the same between my three sons—Arthur Thompson, Edward Thompson, and James Thompson—and my five daughters — Catherine Thompson, Elizabeth Thompson, Mary Anne Thompson, Annie Thompson, and Cecilia Thompson—share and share alike, the respective shares of my said sons to be paid to each of them on their severally attaining the age of twenty-eight years; but as to the shares of my said daughters who shall have attained or shall attain the age of twenty-eight years, or shall marry under that age with the consent and approbation of the trustees or trustee for the time being of this my will, it is my will that the interest, income, and dividends of each of their presumptive shares shall be paid to them respectively until they shall be married, and upon the marriage of each and every of my said daughters my said trustees are to settle upon her her presumptive share of my property, with remainder to her issue, with cross remainder between and among each and all my said daughters."

The will further contained the following clause: "Provided always, and I hereby direct the trustees or trustee for the time being of this my will, that in the event of any child or children embracing a religious life—that is to say, becoming a Roman Catholic priest, monk, nun, sister of mercy, or a member of any other religious community bound by a monastic vow or vows, then and in that case the provision for each such child as shall be a son to be £1,000, to be paid to him if he shall attain the age of twenty-eight years, but not otherwise; and for each child as shall be a daughter to be £500, to be paid to her if she shall attain the age of twenty-eight years, but not otherwise, on her attaining that age."

By a codicil dated the 22nd of February, 1884, the testator extended the provisions of his will to three younger children—Henry, Hilda, and Mary Irene Thompson.

Hilda married A. C. Thomas.

There was no gift over of any of the children's shares.

Henry Thompson, one of the sons aged twenty-five, and who had been for over a year a novice in a monastery at Ramsgate, claimed to be paid his share of the testator's estate; and the question raised by summons for the decision of the court was as to the effect of the condition in the will against any child embracing a religious life.

Macswinney, for the trustees of Edward Thompson's will.—The clause as to the religious life is a valid condition subsequent, and equivalent to a revocation of the prior gift: Re Dickson, 1 Sim. N. S. 37; Re Catt's Trusts, 12 W. R. 739, 2 H. & M. 46. The condition may operate any time during the life of any child as to his or her share, and no share of the capital above £1,000 can be given to any child until his or her death.

E. C. Macnaghten, for Mr. and Mrs. Thomas.

Byrne, Q.C., and Stokes, for Henry Thompson.—The testator has tried to cut down a prior absolute gift by the condition as to embracing a religious life. FABER v. MONTAGU. (a.)

Trustee—Infant—Infant tenant in tail in possession—Vesting order—Form of order—Trustee Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 53), ss. 31, 32, 50.

The effect of an order under the Trustee Act, 1893, appointing a person to convey the estate of an infant tenant in tail in possession for all such estate as the infant could if of full age convey, is to bar the estate tail and the remainders over; and no reference is needed to a disentailing deed or the Fines and Recoveries Act (as set out in Seton on Judgments, 5th ed., vol. 2, p. 1067, Form No. 21).

Under an indenture of resettlement, dated the 26th of August, 1843, hereditaments known as "the Melton Estate" were limited to the use of Andrew Montagu for life, with remainder to James Montagu for life, with remainder to the first and other sons of James Montagu in tail male, with remainder to the daughters of James Montagu in tail, with remainder to Andrew Montagu in fee simple.

James Montagu died on the 11th of January, 1891, leaving male and female issue, the eldest of whom, Frederick James Osbaldeston Montagu, on the death of Andrew Montagu on the 8th of October, 1895, was aged seventeen years, and became tenant in tail male in possession. Andrew Montagu by his will, dated the 16th of September, 1895, devised real estate to which he was absolutely entitled (referred to in the will as the "secondly devised premises") to the use of trustees so long as Frederick J. O. Montagu should be living and under the age of twenty-five years, with certain powers of management, with remainder to the use of Frederick J. O. Montagu for life without impeachment of waste, with remainder to uses in favour of the sons and daughters of Frederick J. O. Montagu in tail male and in tail, with remainder to uses and upon trusts in favour of the brothers and sisters of Frederick J. O. Montagu and other persons.

The testator then devised the Melton Estate to the uses and upon the trusts and subject to the powers in his will declared concerning the "secondly devised premises," declaring that the last mentioned devise should take effect under the doctrine of election, and should thereby bind Frederick J. O. Montagu and every person who should become tenant in tail male or in tail in possession of the Melton Estate under the indenture of resettlement, and that Frederick J. O. Montagu and every other such person should accordingly, at the request and to the satisfaction of the trustees, at the expense of the Melton Estate execute, enrol, perfect, and do all such assurances and things, deeds, instruments, and acts as might be necessary for evidencing such election and giving effect to the devise of "the Melton Estate." And the testator declared that if Frederick J. O. Montagu or any of such other persons should refuse or neglect to comply with the request of his trustees, or should fail to execute, enrol, perfect, and do such assurances, &c., his will should be construed and the rights of all persons claiming thereunder should be determined in all respects as if the person so refusing, neglecting, or failing had died immediately before the testator, without having been married.

Upon an application in the matter of the infants his lordship, being of opinion that it would be for the infants' benefit to elect to take in accordance with the provisions of the will, on the 13th of December, 1895, appointed C. H. Morton guardian of the infants' estate.

The writ in this action was issued on the 16th of December, 1895, on behalf of the trustees of the will as plaintiffs, against Frederick J. O. Montagu and his brothers and sisters as defendants, to determine whether the infant defendants, or any of them, were bound forthwith to elect to take in accordance with the will; and that, if so, such election should be declared for them or him by the court, and directions given for complying with the will and vesting "the Melton Estate" in accordance therewith.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Brabant, for the plaintiffs.—The right course is to obtain an order appointing a person to convey the estate of the infant tenant in tail in possession: Powell v. Mathews, 1 Jur. N. S. 973; Hargreaves v. Wright, 1 W. R. 408. The court having by the order of the 13th of December, 1895, declared that it would be for the benefit of Frederich J. O. Montagu to take in accordance with the provisions of the will, no further election on his behalf is necessary: Seton, 5th ed., vol. ii., p. 1339, form 3; Lamb v. Lamb, 5 W. R. 772; Blunt v Lack, 3 Jur. N. S. 195, 5 W. R. Dig. 18. [KEKEWICH, J., referred to Bankes v. Small, 35 W. R. 765, 36 Ch. D. 716.] By the Trustee Act of 1893, ss. 31 and 33, the court is empowered where any judgment is given for the conveyance of land to declare that the parties to the action are trustees within the meaning of the Act, and to make an order appointing a person to convey. A form of order for the conveyance of freeholds by an infant is given in Seton, 5th ed., vol. ii., p. 1067, form 21, but no enrolment or reference to the Fines and Recoveries Act is now necessary: Mason v. Mason, 26 W. R. 565, 7 Ch. D. 707. The Trustee Act, 1893, s. 50, defines "convey" and "conveyance" as including the acts to be performed by the tenant in tail in accordance with the Fines and Recoveries Act.

P. O. Lawrence and A. F. Morton, for the defendants.—The giving of effect to the election should be postponed until the infants are of age: Boughton v. Boughton, 2 Ves. Sen. 12.

KEKEWICH, J.—When once the court finds that it can enforce the execution of a disentailing assurance, it can do so as against an infant, and declare him a trustee, and I direct an order to be drawn up accordingly.

The order was finally settled as follows:—Declare that it is for the benefit of the infant defendant, Frederick James Osbaldeston Montagu, to take in accordance with the will of the above-named Andrew Montagu; and declare that the manors, lands, and hereditaments in the county of York comprised in and now subject to the uses of the indenture of resettlement dated the 26th day of August, 1843, in the statement of claim in this action mentioned, and which manors, lands, and hereditaments are hereinafter referred to as "the Melton Estate," ought, in pursuance of the provision in that behalf in the said will of the said Andrew Montagu, to be conveyed to the uses, upon the trusts, and subject to the powers and provisions in such will contained concerning the manors and hereditaments thereby devised which are therein referred to as "the secondly devised premises," and that the said manors, lands, and hereditaments be conveyed accordingly. And it appearing that the said defendant F. J. O. Montagu is tenant in tail male in possession under the said indenture of resettlement of the said Melton Estate, and that he is an infant, declare that the said defendant F. J. O. Montagu is a trustee of the Melton Estate within the meaning of the Trustee Act, 1893; and let Charles Henry Morton be appointed to convey the said Melton Estate for all such estate as the infant defendant F. J. O. Montagu could, if of full age, convey unto the plaintiffs as the general trustees of the will of the said A. Montagu and their heirs discharged from the estate in tail male of the said defendant F. J. O. Montagu under the said indenture of resettlement, and from all estates, rights, interests, and powers to take effect after the determination or in defeasance of such estate in tail male, to the uses, upon the trusts, and subject to the powers and provisions in the said will declared, contained, or referred to, concerning the said secondly devised premises; and let the said C. H. Morton convey the same accordingly, such conveyance to be settled by the judge.

NICOL v. HENNESSEY. (a.)

Sale—Trover—Wrongful sale by co-owner of shares in a ship—Implied contract of sale.

The plaintiff was the owner of certain shares in a ship. The defendant, who was the managing owner of the ship, being desirous of selling the ship, in a letter addressed to the plaintiff asked her for a bill of sale of her shares. This she refused to give, but subsequently she offered to sell her shares for £100. The defendant, without further communication with her, sold the ship with the consent of all the other co-owners at a price which would have yielded to the plaintiff in respect of her shares a less sum than £100.

Held, that there was an implied contract on the part of the defendant to pay for the shares as upon a contract of sale, and that, though there was no presumption of law that the defendant agreed to pay any price asked, yet, it being found that the price asked was a reasonable one, a presumption arose from the facts of the case that the defendant agreed to pay that price.

Action.

The plaintiff was the owner of two 64th shares in the sailing ship Woodhall, for which she had paid in 1891 £180.

The defendant, who was the plaintiff's brother, was the managing owner of the ship.

On the 3rd of January, 1896, the defendant, with the consent of owners representing thirty-eight 64th shares, entered into a contract to sell the ship for £1,875, less £50 for commission.

On the 29th of January he wrote to the plaintiff, telling her of the intended sale, and asking her to send him the bill of sale of her two shares.

The plaintiff refused to consent to the sale, and asked the defendant to furnish her with the accounts of the ship's voyages.

Further correspondence ensued, and the accounts were eventually delivered; whereupon the plaintiff wrote on the 17th of February:—

"Thanks for statement re Woodhall extending over a period of two years, from January, 1894, to January, 1896, showing a net loss of £469. This is, of course, very much to be regretted, but does not, I think, by any means justify sacrificing the property for less than a third of its original value, having regard to what she has done in past times and may be reasonably expected to do with a renewal of trade. However, I do not wish to cause unnecessary trouble, and therefore I am willing to sell my two shares for £100."

The defendant did not send any reply to that letter, but on the 19th of February, having obtained the consent of all the owners except the plaintiff, he transferred the ship and cancelled the register, at the same time giving the purchaser a bill of sale of the plaintiff's two shares, together with an indemnity against any action being brought in respect of them.

On the 21st of February the defendant's solicitor wrote to the plaintiff offering to send her a cheque for £57 0s. 6d., respresenting the proportion of the purchase money due to her in respect of her two shares, in exchange for a bill of sale of the shares.

This offer the plaintiff refused to accept, and she brought the present action to recover £100, the price of the shares, and alternatively to recover damages for conversion.

The defendant paid £57 0s. 6d. into court.

H. T. Boyd, for the plaintiff.—The defendant has dealt improperly with the plaintiff's goods. The plaintiff is entitled to waive the tort, and the law will imply a contract on the part of the defendant to buy the plaintiff's shares for £100, the price she asked for them: Hill v. Perrott, 3 Taunt. 274, and Abbotts v. Barry, 2 Brod. & B. 369. [COLLINS, J., referred to Lee v. Shore, 1 B. & C. 94.] The majority owners have no right to sell. The managing owner should have commenced a co-ownership action in Admiralty to compel his co-owners to sell. The defendant has paid £57 0s 6d. into court. That amounts to an admission that there was a contract of sale: Bennett v. Francis, 2 Bos. & P. 550.

For the defendant evidence was called to show that the ship was not worth more than £1,500 or £1,600.

H. Holman, for the defendant.—The true measure of damages is the market price of the plaintiff's shares at the time of the sale; £57 0s. 6d. was the full value.

COLLINS, J.—There is no defence to this action. The only question is what sum ought the defendant to pay. [His lordship, after reciting the facts, proceeded:—] The defendant had received from his sister a refusal to consent to the sale, and he had told her that her holding out would prevent the sale taking place. She therefore offered to sell her shares for £100, and he, without saying more, gave a bill of sale of her two shares to the purchaser of the ship. I do not think it would be a very violent inference to draw, that he consented to the terms on which she was willing to sell.

The authorities cited establish the proposition that if a person deals with and exercises acts of ownership over the property of another then there is an implied contract to pay for the property as on a contract of sale. Therefore a presumption arises that plaintiff's interest was sold to the defendant, and there was an implied contract that the defendant should pay for it. I do not think that there was an implied contract for the price named by the plaintiff; for the plaintiff might have mentioned an unreasonable amount, say £500. The legal presumption is limited to a reasonable price. But the legal presumption is quite distinct from the presumption arising from the facts of the case. So that here I do not think it is a violent presumption to say that £100 is to be taken as the amount which he agreed to pay in order that he might deal with the shares.

I am not bound to accept the evidence for the defendant as to the value of the ship. Where the owner of the chattel sold is not under any obligation to sell the price got is no evidence of the value of the chattel to the owner, who may not be willing to sell at all. No sale against the wish of the plaintiff could have been made without the intervention of the court. She has been deprived of the benefit of such an inquiry; so that here I say that £100 is not only the agreed value, but I am not sure whether it is not also the true value of the shares.

Judgment for the plaintiff for £100 with costs.

REG. v. HOPKINS AND FERGUSON. (a.)

Criminal law—Charge on property to defraud creditors —Bill of sale executed by defendant in pending action —Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), s. 13.

The plaintiff in an action to recover unliquidated damages is not a creditor of the defendant within section 13, sub-section (2), of the Debtors Act, 1869, until he has signed judgment. Therefore the defendant in such an action who before judgment has granted a bill of sale over his property with intent to defeat any judgment which the plaintiff may obtain cannot be convicted under that sub-section of having made a charge on his property with intent to defraud the plaintiff.

Case stated by the Recorder of Manchester.

The defendants were jointly indicted at the Manchester Quarter Sessions, Hopkins for having, on the 8th of October, 1894, unlawfully and with intent to defraud one Annie Copeland, a creditor of Hopkins, made a charge on the property of Hopkins, to wit, a bill of sale of all the household furniture and other effects of Hopkins in and upon certain premises, and Ferguson for having aided and abetted Hopkins.

Section 13 of the Debtors Act, 1869, enacts that a person shall be guilty of a misdemeanour (sub-section (2)) "if he has, with intent to defraud his creditors or any of them, made or caused to be made any gift, delivery, or transfer of or any charge on his property."

It was proved that on the 8th of October, 1894, an action to recover damages for breach of promise of marriage was pending between Annie Copeland as plaintiff and Hopkins as defendant; that on that day Hopkins granted in favour of Ferguson a bill of sale of all his furniture and effects upon certain premises, and that at the time the bill of sale was granted both the defendants had the intention to defeat any judgment and execution which Annie Copeland might obtain in her action; and that on the 2nd of November, 1894, judgment in the action was given for the plaintiff for £25 and costs.

At the close of the case for the prosecution it was objected on behalf of the defendants that, inasmuch as at the time of the granting of the bill of sale Annie Copeland had not recovered judgment against Hopkins, she was not then a creditor within the meaning of sub-section (2) of section 13 of the Debtors Act, 1869.

The recorder overruled the objection, and the jury found both the defendants guilty.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the recorder was right in holding that Annie Copeland was, on the 8th of October, 1894, a creditor of Hopkins within the above sub-section.

C. Rose-Innes, for Hopkins, was stopped by the court.

C. A. Russell, for Ferguson, was not called upon to argue.

M'Keand, for the prosecution.—Section 13, sub-section (2), of the Debtors Act, 1869, applies to an intention to defraud future as well as present creditors. In Barling v. Bishopp, 8 W. R. 631, 29 Beav. 417, it was held that a voluntary conveyance made by a defendant in an action of trespass after notice of trial with the object of defrauding future creditors was void under 13 Eliz. c. 5.

LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—I have no doubt as to what our decision ought to be in this case. The simple point for our consideration is whether the prosecutrix was at the time this bill of sale was granted a creditor of Hopkins within the meaning of section 13, sub-section (2), of the Debtors Act, 1869. In my judgment it is perfectly clear that she was not. She had brought an action for breach of promise of marriage against him, in which she might or might not succeed; in other words, she had a cause of action against him at that date which might, and in the event did, mature into a judgment. Indeed, if she had already obtained a verdict in her favour, but had not signed judgment, she would not have been a creditor of Hopkins. Jones v. Thompson, 6 W. R. 443, E. B. & E. 63, is an authority for that proposition. This disposes of the case against both defendants, for if Hopkins could not be convicted Ferguson could not be convicted of aiding and abetting him.

The convictions must be quashed.

POLLOCK, B., and HAWKINS and CAVE, JJ., concurred.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I only wish to add that even in cases arising under 13 Eliz. c. 5, which has been referred to, a narrower construction has been placed upon those portions of the Act which deal with criminal matters than upon those which deal with civil rights and remedies.

Convictions quashed.

Ex parte WOLFE. (a.)

Bankruptcy — Petition — Inequitable proceeding — Debt payable at future time — Amount of debt for which petition should be presented — Rebate of interest — Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 6, sub-section 1 (b); s. 7, sub-section 3.

A debt due on a promissory note at three months which are unexpired is a good petitioning creditor's debt, although the lender has given the borrower the option of renewing the note at the expiration of every three months on payment of forehand interest.

On presenting a petition for a debt payable in future the creditor must allow a rebate of interest.

It is not inequitable to take proceedings in bankruptcy upon a note not yet due, and given with such option of renewal, in a case where the creditor has notice of an act of bankruptcy committed by the debtor.

Appeal from the dismissal of a bankruptcy petition by the registrar of the county court at Bradford.

Upon the 16th of August, 1895, Wolfe, the petitioning creditor, lent Barr, the debtor, £100, taking a bill at three months for £115, and giving the debtor the following written undertaking:—

"August 16, 1895.

"This is to certify that in the event of Robert Barr, who has this day borrowed the sum of £100, being unable to pay the same, with interest (namely, the sum of £15 as per promissory note), at the end of three months, the same shall be renewed, provided the sum of £15 is paid from time to time as interest."

In November the debtor paid £15, and the note was renewed until February, 1896. In December he committed an act of bankruptcy by having his goods seized and sold. Wolfe presented a petition founded on this act of bankruptcy in January. It was dismissed by the registrar on the ground that under the circumstances of the case proceedings in bankruptcy were inequitable.

Wolfe appealed.

A. H. Carrington, for the appellant.—Although the creditor here had renewed the bill until February, there was nothing inequitable in his presenting a petition in January, because he had notice of the act of bankruptcy in December and could not safely take any money in payment off of the loan from the debtor: Re Lowe, Ex parte Lowe, 38 W. R. 560, 7 Morr. 25. His only chance of recovering any of the money he had lent was to make the debtor a bankrupt.

C. E. Jones, for the respondent.—The debt was not one upon which a petition could be presented, because it was not payable at a certain future time. The debtor had the option of renewing the bill indefinitely, therefore the date of its payment was uncertain. There are no cases showing that a current bill is a good petitioning creditor's debt. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., referred to Ex parte Douthat, 4 B. & Ald. 67.] [KENNEDY, J., referred to Hill v. Harris, 1 Moo. & M. 448.] I also say that the proceedings were inequitable, because the creditor's undertaking of the 16th of August amount to an implied covenant not to sue upon the bill.

A. H. Carrington, in reply.—The effect of the prepayment of interest was only to renew the bill for three months certain. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—Then in one way or another there was a promise to forbear taking proceedings for three months.] No, the creditor reserves his rights in bankruptcy. The effect of taking the forehand interest depends on the terms of the undertaking of August 16. By renewing the bill the creditor only means that he will make the debt payable at a future date. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—Does not the acceptance of forehand interest always imply a covenant not to sue?] I say it only puts the debt off, makes it payable in future instead of in præsenti. I contend that the consideration for which it was given has not failed because the debt was put off. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—Will you offer to return the forehand interest?] Yes, I will give it up.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 2.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., delivered the judgment of the court.—This is an appeal against the registrar of the County Court of Bradford refusing a receiving order, and, as far as I understand his refusal, it was based on the ground that in his opinion it would have been inequitable to make a receiving order. So far as that ground goes we think he was wrong. The supposed equity was based on an agreement of the 16th of August, 1895, whereby the petitioning creditor undertook constantly to renew an acceptance for money lent upon the terms of forehand interest being paid, and the registrar seems to have thought it inequitable that the petitioning creditor should base a petition on such an acceptance, but we think that, the debtor having committed an act of bankruptcy, there was nothing inequitable in the petitioning creditor acting as he did.

It remains that we should see if there is any other ground upon which the refusal can be supported. Under the Bankruptcy Acts prior to 1869 a debt presently due, payable in future, was a good petitioning creditor's debt. It was not so under the Act of 1869, but became so again in 1883 by virtue of section 6 (1) (b), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883: "6 (1) A creditor shall not be entitled to present a bankruptcy petition against a debtor unless (b) the debt is a liquidated sum payable either immediately or at some certain future time."

The only question therefore is whether the effect of the letter of the 16th of August, 1895, is to prevent the debt being payable at some certain future time. [His lordship here read the letter.] Notwithstanding this letter giving, apparently for an indefinite time, to the debtor the right to have the note renewed, nevertheless there is a debt payable at some certain future time, and we think the petition cannot be dismissed. We arrived at this conclusion upon the hearing of the argument, but I was anxious, as the judge in bankruptcy, that there should be no precedent which would enable a creditor under these circumstances to support a petition for a larger debt than he is really entitled to. Here is a debt payable in future, the three months not having run out. The question arises as to what is the amount of debt for which the creditor may prove. In this case there was only a short time to run, but I take it that in any case a creditor should not rely on more than remains after rebate of interest. Further, in this case the consideration has partly failed, and there is a bonus within section 23 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890; but Mr. Carrington is willing to claim only £100, without prejudice to the right of the creditor to amend his proof by adding what he may think is due to him for interest by virtue of the terms of his bargain.

Appeal allowed.

In re ALICE SCOTT.
Ex parte ALICE SCOTT. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Act of bankruptcy—Oral notice of suspension of payment by non-trader — Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 4, sub-section 1 (h).

A statement by a debtor who is not a trader that he is unable to pay his debts should not be construed as a notice of intention to suspend payment unless accompanied by a statement tending to show that the debtor proposes to deal with his creditors collectively.

Appeal by the debtor from a receiving order made against her by the registrar of the county court at Canterbury.

One of Miss Scott's creditors called upon her upon the 16th of January, 1896, to collect his own debt and that of the petitioning creditor, and she asked him to call again upon the 18th. When he called upon the 18th the servant opened the door upon the chain, and said that Miss Scott would see no one. Miss Scott also called out from within. "I will not see anyone." The creditor said, "Will you not pay my debt or Mr. X.'s?" (the petitioning creditor's); to which Miss Scott replied, "No, I won't pay anybody now. It is too late now, I am acting under advice. I refuse to see anybody at all."

The registrar found that these words constituted a notice of suspension of payment, and made a receiving order against Miss Scott, from which she appealed.

J. W. Weigall, for the appellant.—Miss Scott did not intend any notice of suspension by her words. She meant that it was too late in the evening to deal with the creditor, and that she would pay him shortly. If this is held to be a notice of suspension, it will be dangerous to tell a man that you cannot pay him now, but will pay him at the end of the week when your dividends come in.

He cited Ex parte Oastler, Re Friedlander, 33 W. R. 126, 13 Q. B. D. 471; Crook v. Morley, [1891] A. C. 316, 40 W. R. Dig. 14; In re North, Ex parte Hasluck, [1895] 2 Q. B. 264, 43 W. R. Dig. 10; In re Morgan, Ex parte Turner, ante, p. 96.

Muir Mackenzie, for the respondent.—Miss Scott must have intended to give notice of suspension, or to imply that she could not pay her debts in full, for as a matter of fact she owed on the 18th of January far more than she could pay. At the lowest it was a notice of "temporary suspension" within Lord Watson's judgment in Crook v. Morley.

J. W. Weigall replied.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—This case raises a new point. The old cases are cases where the debtor is a trader and sends out a circular. Here the debtor is not a trader, and there is no circular; and what we have to determine is whether her words uttered on the 18th of January, "No, I won't pay anybody now. It is too late now, I am acting under advice. I refuse to see anybody at all," amount to a notice of suspension or intention to suspend payment within section 4, sub-section 1 (h) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

Speaking for myself, I have considerable doubt as to whether the Legislature intended to apply this sub-section to non-traders. In ordinary parlance the term "suspension of payment" only applies to people in business. However, the Legislature has not qualified this sub-section so as to limit it to traders, so I am not prepared to say that it does not apply to non-traders.

When one has to consider the point the fact must be taken into consideration that the person who spoke these words was not a trader.

If one held every refusal by a debtor to an individual creditor to pay a debt at the moment when it is demanded to be an act of bankruptcy, one would be giving to the sub-section a much wider meaning than it was ever intended to have. The true limit is to be found in this way: it must be a notice of suspension of payment in ordinary course. In the case of a trader payment in ordinary course is payment of commercial debts as they come due. If a creditor calls and demands payment, and receives not only a refusal to pay but a refusal to pay based on inability to pay, it may well be held that that amounts to a notice of suspension or notice of intention to suspend in the case of a trader, because it is a notice of suspension or a notice of intention to suspend payment of debts in ordinary course; but with a private person ordinary course is not the same thing as with a trader.

With private persons the times when calls for money may be expected are obviously different from what they are with traders whose commercial creditors look to be paid at specified times. Creditors of private persons sometimes send their bills in at once, sometimes quarterly, sometimes half-yearly, or at more distant intervals; and if a debtor who is not a trader says to his creditor, "I can't pay you now, I can't pay anybody till my rents come in," that cannot be held to amount to a notice of intention to suspend payment. If the debtor in this case had merely said, "I can't pay you or anyone at present, but hope to pay all soon," she would not have brought herself within the sub-section.

I am convinced myself that what the sub-section points at is the case of a debtor dealing with his creditors as a body; if a debtor proposes to deal collectively with his creditors, that brings him within it, but neither in the case of a trader nor of a private person is there a notice of intention to suspend payment unless there is a notice of what involves dealing with the creditors in a body. If the debtor here had merely given the creditor notice that she was unable to pay him, that would not have been enough. I therefore have to look and see if I can find anything more, and I do find it. "I am advised not to see anybody. It is too late, I am acting under advice." That showed a state of things had arisen which necessitated her dealing with her creditors collectively. What she was saying was: "I have taken advice, I am advised that I must deal with my creditors collectively, I am to see nobody." The advice obviously is not to deal with any creditor separately; and therefore I think her words amounted to a notice of intention to suspend payment.

I do not find that this notice falls within the sub-section because this lady refused to pay or see her creditor; but I base my finding purely on this, that it was notice that she had taken advice, and intended to deal with her creditors collectively.

Ex parte THE NATIONAL PROVINCIAL BANK OF ENGLAND (LIMITED). (a.)

Bankruptcy—Proof—Guarantee to bankers for whole account with limited liability—Proof by creditor after payment by surety—Admission of proof in full.

A surety guaranteed the whole of the indebtedness of S. to a bank, but the total amount recoverable from him was not to exceed £300. Subsequently a receiving order was made against S. when his indebtedness to the bank amounted to over £700. The surety paid the £300 to the bank, after which they presented a proof for the whole debt.

Held, that they were entitled to prove for the whole of their debt, for, the guarantee being for the whole amount, the surety could not prove against the estate unless he paid the bank in full.

Appeal by the National Provincial Bank of England, Limited, against the partial rejection of their proof by the official receiver, trustee in the bankruptcy of Sass.

Edwin Sass, the bankrupt, had an account with the bank, which was overdrawn to the extent of about £800 at the date of his being made bankrupt. As security against his overdrafts the bank held a guarantee from a Mr. Stourton, of which the following were the material parts:—

"I, the undersigned, Henry Stourton, hereby guarantee to you the payment of any sum or sums of money which may be now or may hereafter from time to time become due or owing to your bank anywhere from or by Edwin Etty Sass, his executors or administrators (who are all hereinafter referred to as "the said debtor"), either solely or jointly with any other person or persons in partnership or otherwise, upon banking account or upon any discount or other account, or for any other matter or thing whatsoever, including the usual banking charges. This guarantee is to be a security for the whole amount now due or owing to you, or which may hereafter from time to time, until the expiration of the notice hereinafter mentioned, become due or owing to you by the said debtor, but nevertheless the total amount recoverable hereon shall not exceed Three hundred pounds, in addition to such further sum for interest and other banking charges and for costs as shall accrue after the date of demand by you for payment. . . . And in case of bankruptcy, liquidation by arrangement, or composition with creditors, any dividends you may receive from the estates of the said debtor or others shall not prejudice your right to recover from me, my executors or administrators, to the full extent of this guarantee any sum which after the receipt of such dividends may remain owing to you from the debtor."

In 1894 the bank called upon the guarantor to pay the sum guaranteed, and he paid them the £300 and £3 11s. 9d. interest from the date of their demand. The bank placed this amount to the credit of their "Realized Securities Account," and did not treat it as a payment received from the debtor. Upon February 14th, 1895, they proved against the estate of the debtor for the full amount owing to them. The trustee rejected their proof to the extent of £303 11s. 9d., the amount received by them from the guarantor.

The bank appealed.

Herbert Reed, Q.C., (Yate Lee with him), for the bank.—A creditor with a guarantee in this form is entitled to prove for the whole amount due from the debtor. The debtor's estate should not get the benefit of payments made by a surety whom the debtor was bound to indemnify. The trustee cannot set up that there might be two proofs presented, for the guarantee is for the whole amount owing to the bank, and the surety could not prove unless he paid the bank the whole amount owing to them: The Midland Banking Co. v. Chambers, 17 W. R. 598, L. R. 4 Ch. App. 398; Ex parte The National Provincial Bank, In re Reese, 29 W. R. 796, 17 Ch. D. 98; The Yorkshire Bank v. Thomas (unreported, Collins, J., March 20, 1895). The rule which the trustee seeks to apply is only applicable to cases of negotiable securities: In re Blakeley, Ex parte Aachener Disconto Gesellschaft, 9 Morrell, 173; The Commercial Bank of Australia v. Wilson, 41 W. R. 603, [1893] A. C. 181.

Muir Mackenzie, for the official receiver (trustee).—The terms of this guarantee are unlike those in the cases cited against me. It only provides that the bank may sue the guarantor after receiving a dividend from the estate. If they are paid by the guarantor before proving, they cannot prove in full against the estate. This guarantee should be construed as applicable to part only of the debt; Ellis v. Emmanuel, 24 W. R. 832, 1 Ex. D. 157. The surety could prove upon this guarantee for the amount he has paid, Wolmershausen v. Gullick, [1893] 2 Ch 514, 41 W. R. Dig. 16, 193.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—In this case I think the official receiver was wrong in rejecting part of the proof. In my opinion the common law right of the bank here was to sue the debtor for the whole amount due from him, irrespective of the amount paid by the surety, unless that came to twenty shillings in the pound. In bankruptcy the principal creditor has a right to prove for the whole of his debt, unless the surety is a surety for part of the debt only, and has paid that part; then the right of proof pro tanto goes to the surety, who is entitled to stand in the shoes of the principal creditor to the extent of the amount which he has paid.

Here all that I have to do is to examine this guarantee, and see whether, as between the bank and the surety, the surety was for the whole or part of the debt, and it is clear that he was surety for the whole, notwithstanding the fact that his liability was limited; and he, having paid part only of the debt, could not be allowed to prove in the bankruptcy. I should have said that this was quite clear upon the first part of this guarantee; but if there were any doubt, the last clause amply suffices, either by itself or read with the first part, to show that, as between the bank and the surety the bargain was that the bank should have the benefit of all sums paid as dividends or otherwise; and it would be wrong to hold that the surety, as against the bank, could have any rights by reason of his guarantee, unless he paid them the full amount owing by the debtor. The proof must be admitted for the full amount.

Appeal allowed, with costs.

Per Lord Davey.—The doctrine of consolidation is applicable where, at the date when redemption is sought, all the mortgages are united in one hand and redeemable by the same person; or where, after that state of things has once existed, the equities of redemption have become separated.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (Lord Herschell, C., Lindley and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.) reported as Pledge v. Carr, 43 W. R. 50, [1895] 1 Ch. 51, affirming that of Romer, J., 42 W. R. 620.

The facts are given in Lord Davey's judgment, where the cases are discussed.

Levett, Q.C., and Bramwell Davis, Q.C. (Cater with them), for the appellant.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Edwin Ward, for the respondents, were not heard.

The House took time for consideration.

Lord HALSBURY, C.—I have had an opportunity of considering the judgment prepared by my noble and learned friend (Lord Davey), and I am not prepared to dissent from it. I use that form of expression because I confess I lament the conclusion to which it has been found necessary to come, although I believe the strict principle upon which it rests is founded in our law at present, and in dealing with a technical system it is better to adhere to a principle when once established than to create greater confusion by dissenting from it. I think the principle laid down in Vint v. Padgett, 6 W. R. 641, 2 De G. & J. 611, has been so firmly established now by authority in our technical system that I feel that more mischief would be done by dissenting from it than by acquiescing in it. For these reasons I am content with the judgment which my noble and learned friend has prepared, and shall assent to the motion that he will make.

Lord WATSON.—I also have had an opportunity of carefully considering the judgment about to be delivered by my noble and learned friend opposite. For my own part, I should have desired if possible to decide otherwise; but I am compelled to say that I concur with the reasonings and the conclusion of my noble and learned friend.

Lord DAVEY.—The facts of this case are complicated, but they may be stated in a narrow compass sufficiently for elucidating the point of law which is raised. There are seven different properties which are involved in this appeal. There were originally eight, but one of the properties, known as 1 and 2, Shakespeare-terrace, has been dealt with in a separate suit, and the rights of the appellant and respondents in respect of that property are not now in question. One James Banks was the original owner and mortgagor of all these seven properties. James Banks mortgaged 34, Bouverie-square, and 5 and 6, Shakespeare-terrace (which I will refer to as Nos. 1 and 2) to John Banks, by deeds dated respectively the 11th of May and 26th of August, 1863. He mortgaged Pembury Villa (which I will refer to as No. 3) on the 12th of October, 1863, to S. Hobday, and the other four properties (which I will refer to as Nos. 4, 5, 6, and 7) to other mortgagees by deeds dated from the 18th of October, 1865, to the 24th of November, 1866. He then made a second mortgage to Brockman of 4, 5, 6, and 7 by a deed or deeds dated the 27th of November, 1866. He then made a second mortgage of Nos. 1, 2, and 3, and a third mortgage of 4, 5, 6, and 7 to Brockman and Harrison by one deed, dated the 20th of August, 1868. Or, in other words, on that date Banks assigned the equity of redemption on all seven properties to Brockman and Harrison. At that date, therefore, Brockman and Harrison might have redeemed 1, 2, or 3, without redeeming the other properties, but they could not have redeemed either 4, 5, 6, or 7 without redeeming all those four properties. Pledge, the present plaintiff and appellant, became the transferee from Brockman and Harrison of their equity of redemption of all the seven properties on the 1st of April, 1885. In the meantime Brockman, by deeds dated from 1871 to 1873, became the transferee of the first mortgages on Nos. 1, 2, 4, and 5. The defendants and respondents are the surviving executors of Brockman, who died in 1877, and on the 27th of December, 1890, they became the transferees of the first mortgage on No. 3. From that date, therefore, the equity of redemption on all seven properties was vested in the appellant, subject to mortgages on the several properties all vested in the respondents.

In these circumstances, on the 30th of March, 1893, the appellant issued his writ in this action, by which he claims to redeem No. 2 alone on payment of what is due on the first mortgage of that property only. The defendants claim to consolidate their mortgages on all the seven properties, and say that the appellant cannot redeem No. 2 alone without redeeming the other six properties also. It was admitted at the bar that the respondents had the right to consolidate their mortgages on Nos. 1 and 2, because the mortgages on those properties were vested in one mortgagee, John Banks, before the assignment of the equity of redemption in both to Brockman and Harrison, the appellant's predecessors in title; but the appellant contends that they are not entitled to consolidate their mortgages on 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7 with their mortgage on No. 2, because these mortgages did not become united in title with the mortgage which he desires to redeem on No. 2 until after the date on which the equity of redemption was assigned to his predecessors in title—viz., the 20th of August, 1868, and his counsel argues that the rights of the appellant and respondents must be determined by the state of circumstances at that date. The question for your lordships' decision is whether the respondents have the right of consolidation which they claim, notwithstanding that the mortgages which it is sought to consolidate were not united in title with the mortgage sought to be redeemed until after the assignment of the equity of redemption to the present appellant's predecessors in title.

Romer, J., by whom the action was tried, and the Court of Appeal held that the case was covered by the decision of Knight-Bruce and Turner, L.JJ., in the year 1858, in Vint v. Padgett, which it was not competent for them to question, and accordingly decided in favour of the respondents. The appellant's counsel admit that they cannot distinguish the present case from that decision, but contend that it is wrong and ought to be reversed by your lordships.

The equitable rule as to the consolidation of mortgages is not one of those doctrines of the Court of Chancery which has met with general approbation, at any rate as regards its later development. Originally it may have been a right of a mortgagee holding two separate mortgages on estates of the same mortgagor, which have become absolute estates at law against the mortgagor and debtor personally, to refuse to be redeemed as regards one estate without having his other debt also paid. But it has long been settled that the right of consolidation may be exercised by the transferee of the mortgages as well as by the original mortgagee, and may be exercised in respect of equitable mortgages as well as by a mortgagee holding the legal estate absolute at law; and, on the other hand, it may be asserted against the assignee of an equity of redemption from the mortgagor as well as against the mortgagor himself.

If Vint v. Padgett had been an isolated decision on a new point, then, notwithstanding the eminence of the learned judges who were parties to the decision, it may be that your lordships would have felt disposed to review it; and if it did not appear to your lordships a necessary or legitimate development of the doctrine, your lordships would probably be disposed to express your dissent from it, as was done with regard to another decision of the same learned judges by this House in the case of Jennings v. Jordan, 30 W. R. 369, 6 App. Cas. 698. But it is obvious that the learned judges did not conceive themselves to be laying down new law. Knight-Bruce, L.J., said that a long course and series of authorities binding on the court precluded the possibility of their thinking that there was in the case more that one arguable question, if any—viz., as to the materiality of notice of a second mortgage to a transferee of prior mortgages; and Turner, L.J., said it was impossible to distinguish the case from Bovey v. Skipwith (a case decided in the reign of Charles II., to which I will presently refer) on any other ground than as to notice being material.

In Tweedale v. Tweedale, 23 Beav. 341, 6 W. R. Ch. Dig. 44 (decided in 1857, the year before Vint v. Padgett), the union of two mortgages made to different mortagees took place after the assignment of the equity of redemption of both mortgaged properties. Lord Romilly held that the assignee could only stand in the position of the mortgagor, and be entitled to his rights only; and if the mortgagor could not have redeemed one property without the other, the assignee stood in no better or more favourable position, and was not entitled to redeem one without redeeming the other. Indeed, the contrary seems from the report to have been scarcely argued in that case.

The case of Vint v. Padgett came before Stuart, V.C., in the first instance, whose judgment, reported in 6 W. R. 321, 1 Giff. 446, may be referred to as showing how entirely that experienced judge considered the point to be settled. "In accepting," he says, "by way of security the equity of redemption of two separate estates, Mr. Lee deliberately incurred the risk of their uniting in one hand; and when that union has taken place there is only one single debt, and in order to redeem he must pay off both mortgages, each of which affects the entirety of both estates."

The old case of Bovey v. Skipwith, 1 Ch. Ca. 201, referred to by Turner, L.J., was a combined case of tacking (in the strict technical sense) and consolidation. There was (1) a mortgage with conveyance of the legal estate in two properties; (2) an assignment of the equity of redemption in the two properties to a second mortgagee; (3) a third mortgage of one of the properties only, without notice of the second mortgage. The third mortgagee bought and took a transfer of the first legal mortgage. It was held, first, that he might tack his equitable third mortgage to the first mortgage; so as to gain priority over the second mortgagee; and, secondly, that having done so he might consolidate his third mortgage (which was was on one estate only) with the first mortgage on both estates, and hold the two estates as against the second mortgagee until all that was due to him on both securities should be satisfied.

The case of Titley v. Davies, before Lord Hardwicke, reported in 2 Y. & C. C. C. 399, may be distinguished on the ground that Titley, the second equitable mortgagee of one of the estates, had before the assignment of the equity of redemption in another estate to Peyton acquired a right to redeem Shepheard, the first mortgagee on both estates, and thereby consolidate the two mortgages. It is not therefore, in my opinion, a direct authority on the present case, in which the consolidation has taken place by purchase and transfer, and not by the exercise of an existing right to redeem.

In Selby v. Pomfret (1861), reported before Wood, V.C. (9 W. R. 398, 1 J. & H. 336), and before Lord Campbell, C. (9 W. R. 583, 3 De G. F. & J. 595), the facts, so far as material for the present purpose, were (1) mortgage to defendants of leasehold premises in Mark-lane on the 26th of June, 1858; (2) mortgage to Stileman and Neale of leasehold premises in Herne Hill on the 1st of February, 1859; (3) mortgagor became bankrupt on the 9th of February, 1859; (4) transfer of the Herne Hill mortgage to defendants on the 16th of February, 1859, and therefore after the bankruptcy of the mortgagor. The Vice-Chancellor held that the defendants were entitled to consolidate the two mortgages against the assignees in bankruptcy of the mortgagor, and to retain the balance due on the Mark-lane mortgage, which was deficient, out of the surplus proceeds of sale of the Herne Hill mortgage. Lord Campbell, in affirming the Vice-Chancellor's decree, said: "It does seem strange that mortgagees, after the bankruptcy of the mortgagor, should be allowed by their own act to vary the rights of themselves and the other creditors of the mortgagor, so as to obtain payment in full of a debt in respect of which, at the time of the bankruptcy, they were only entitled to a dividend along with the body of unsecured creditors. But it is settled that a mortgage executed by a bankrupt before his bankruptcy, where the value of the land mortgaged exceeds the sum secured, is upon the bankruptcy of the mortgagor to be considered tabula in naufragio; and if the assignees do not immediately redeem, any mortgagee of the bankrupt whose security is insufficient may take an assignment of the mortgage and tack to it the debt due under the mortgage to himself. Therefore, the Vice-Chancellor truly observes, 'the fact of the bankruptcy before the defendants took the transfer made no difference. Anyone might seize the plank. The assignees might have got the benefit of it if they had been quick enough; but the defendants were more alert.'" And see Neve v. Pennell, 11 W. R. 986, 2 H. & M. 170.

Although the Lord Chancellor uses the word "tack" it is apparent from the facts of the case which he was dealing with that he meant tacking in the sense of consolidation. The case of Selby v. Pomfret may, no doubt, be distinguished from the present one on the ground that the assignment of the equity of redemption was by operation of law; but if there was no existing right of consolidation at the date of the bankruptcy, the distinction seems to me unsubstantial, because the assignees of the bankrupt take his property subject only to existing equities. The statutory jus tertii of the creditors may be considered as entitled to more consideration, and not less than the right of a particular assignee.

In Beevor v. Luck (1867), 15 W. R. 1221, L. R. 4 Eq. 537, Lord Hatherley held that a mortgagee of one propertymight, as against the assignee of the equity of redemption of another property, consolidate with his mortgage a mortgage from the same mortgagor on that other property of which he had taken a transfer after the date of the assignment of the equity of redemption, of the second property only, overruling the case of White v. Hillacre, 3 Y. & C. Ex. 597.

The extent to which the right of consolidation was carried in this case was criticized by Lord Selborne in this House in Jennings v. Jordan, and so far as it held that mortgages on two properties could be consolidated against the assignee of the equity of redemption of one property only where the union of the two mortgages did not take place until after the separation of the equities of redemption, the case of Beevor v. Luck must be held to be overruled. It was so considered by Fry, J., in Harter v. Colman, 30 W. R. 484, 19 Ch. D. 630.

This case is free from any such difficulty. At the time when redemption is sought all the mortgages are presently redeemable by the same person. Pledge, the plaintiff in the action, became by one transaction the assignee of the entire equity of redemption of all the mortgages. An attentive consideration of Lord Selborne's judgment has satisfied me that the noble and learned lord did not intend to throw any doubt upon the application of the doctrine in such circumstances.

The actual point decided in Jennings v. Jordan was that a mortgagee could not, as against the assignee of an equity of redemption of one property, consolidate with his original mortgage a mortgage on another property created by the same mortgagor after the assignment of the equity of redemption. The contrary had been maintained by the plaintiff on what was probably a misunderstanding of the case of Tassell v. Smith, 6 W. R. 803, 2 De. G. & J. 713. "I take it," said Lord Blackburn, "that the only question before this House is whether where the mortgage on one property is not created till after the equity of redemption on the other property has been parted with there is as against the purchaser an equity to consolidate the two." Their lordships also discussed the question whether in a case where the equities of redemption have become separated, consolidation could take place against the assignee of one equity of redemption only by subsequent union of two mortgages, and they preferred the decision in White v. Hillacre to that of Lord Hatherley in Beevor v. Luck.

Lord Selborne expressed himself in the following words: "A mortgagee who holds several distinct mortgages under the same mortgagor, redeemable not by express contract, but only by virtue of the right which (in English jurisprudence) is called "equity of redemption," may, within certain limits and against certain persons (entitled to redeem all or some of them), consolidate them, that is, treat them as one, and decline to be redeemed as to any unless he is redeemed as to all. This doctrine of consolidation is well established and cannot now be altered, except by the Legislature, whether it originally rested on a sound equitable foundation or not. The present question is as to its limits. There is no difficulty in its application when all the mortgages, whether originally made to the same mortgagee or having come into a single hand by subsequent assignments, are redeemable at the same time by the same person. Its extension to a case in which, after that state of things has once existed, the equities of redemption have become separated by the act of the person in whom they had been combined, though it may perhaps be open to some objection on practical grounds, rests upon an intelligent principle."

After discussing the principle on which such an extension can be defended, Lord Selborne continues: "In the present case the rights of redemption existing at the date of the settlement of 1838," which was the assignment of the equity of redemption in that case, "could not, in my opinion, have been properly worked out (unless by some voluntary arrangement between the parties interested) otherwise than by consolidating all the mortgages now vested in the appellant Jennings which were prior in their creation to the 3rd of December, 1838, as they have been, in fact, consolidated by the decree of the Court of Appeal." (The date mentioned by Lord Selborne, I may observe, was the date on which the assignment of the equity of redemption was made to the appellant's predecessor in that case.) "I have much more difficulty in following or satisfactorily explaining the principle of some other authorities, such as Beevor v. Luck, which have held, contrary to the decision of Baron Alderson in White v. Hillacre, that a mortgagee's right to consolidate, as against the purchaser of the equity of redemption of property mortgaged to him, is capable of being enlarged after the date of that purchase by a transfer to the mortgagee of other mortgages which were then in other hands, and with the equity of redemption of which, if there were no consolidation, the purchaser would have nothing to do."

I understand Lord Selborne to be here speaking only of the case in which the equities of redemption have become separated, and his observations have no reference to a case such as that now before the House, in which all the equities of redemption have been assigned to and are now vested in one person. I do not think that anything was said in this House in Jennings v. Jordan which throws any doubt or discredit on the decision in Vint v. Padgett and the other cases to the same effect. At the time when this action was commenced the exact position contemplated by Lord Selborne had taken place—of all the mortgages being united in a single hand and redeemable by the same person.

It appears to me that an assignee of two or more equities of redemption from one mortgagor stands in a widely different position from the assignee of one equity only. He knows, or has the opportunity of knowing, what are the mortgages subject to which he has purchased the property, and he knows that they may become united by transfer in one hand. If the doctrine of consolidation be once admitted, it appears to me not unreasonable to hold that a person in such a position occupies the place of the mortgagor or assignor to him towards the holders of the mortgages subject to which he has purchased, although it may be unreasonable to hold that he can be affected by the transfer to such holders of mortgages to other persons by the same mortgagor on property which he he has not purchased, and with the equity of redemption of which he has no concern. He does not investigate the title to such other property, and cannot know in the latter case to what mortgages the property is subject. If your lordships affirm the decree now under appeal, the doctrine of consolidation will be confined within at least intelligible limits. It will be applicable where at the date when redemption is sought all the mortgages are united in one hand and redeemable by the same person or where after that state of things has once existed the equities of redemption have become separated. If the purchaser of two or more equities of redemption desires to prevent consolidation, he has it in his power to redeem any one mortgage before consolidation takes place; but if for his own convenience he delays doing so, he runs the same risk as his assignor ran of the mortgages becoming united by transfer in one hand.

I am of opinion that the application of the doctrine of consolidation to a case like the present has been too long considered part of the equitable jurisprudence of this country to be altered at the present time, and it is not so unreasonable as to demand a reversal of it by this House.

I think, therefore, that this appeal should be dismissed, with costs.

Insurance—Assignment of rights to insurer—Settlement of claim—Judicature Act (Queensland) (40 Vict. c. 86).

B. insured the safe delivery of certain wool in the V. Insurance Co. The wool was lost owing to the negligence of K., and the insurance company honestly paid the claim made upon them for such loss by B., and took from him a formal assignment of his causes of action against K., B. stipulating that the assignment should not authorize the use of his name in legal proceedings.

Held, that the insurance company were entitled to the remedies available to B. against K., and although the subrogation by act of law would not give the insurance company a right to sue in their own name, the Judicature Act (corresponding with the English Judicature Act of 1873) and the above assignment together would.

This was an appeal from the Supreme Court of Queensland. The facts and proceedings are given in their lordships' judgment.

Asquith, Q.C., C. E. Jones, and Roskell, for the respondents.

The judgment of their lordships, Lords WATSON, HOBHOUSE, DAVEY, and Sir RICHARD COUCH, was delivered by Lord HOBHOUSE.—The appellant is a nominal defendant representing the Government of Queensland in a suit instituted by the respondents to recover damages under the following circumstances. The Bank of Australasia effected an insurance with the plaintiffs "at and from Townsville to London viâ Torres Strait, including risk of fire and flood from sheep's back until waterborne at Townsville." The insurance was to be upon goods to be loaded in a vessel not named. In point of fact the goods were wool, and the vessel was called The Dorunda. The adventure was stated to begin from the loading of the goods on board the vessel. Some of the wool was on arrival at Townsville put on board a lighter belonging to a firm of wharfingers for the purpose of being conveyed to The Dorunda. While the lighter was moored to the wharf a storm arose, which broke away from their anchorage certain punts belonging to the Government which had not been properly secured. The punts fell foul of the lighter, broke her away from her moorings, capsized her, carried her down stream, and so destroyed or damaged the wool. The bank claimed against the plaintiffs under the policy for a loss of £920. The plaintiffs paid that amount, and took a formal assignment from the bank of all their rights and causes of action against the Government, the bank stipulating that the assignment should not authorize the use of their name in legal proceedings.

By way of defence the Government denied negligence and liability altogether. That question was fully tried at Townsville before Cooper, J., and a special jury, who found to the effect above stated, with the result that judgment was entered for the plaintiffs for £1,007 and costs.

The Government have not further contested the question of negligence, but on a motion to set aside the judgment they raised two objections. One related only to the amount of damages, and in that they partially succeeded. The other was to the effect that the plaintiffs had no right of action, or at any rate none in their own name; because the loss was not within the risks covered by the policy, and because the assignment of a mere right to recover damages was illegal.

The view taken by the Supreme Court was that the plaintiffs were not, by the mere fact of paying the claim, subrogated to the rights of the bank. They thought that the damage done to the wool was not within the terms of the policy. The wool was not loaded on board ship, and therefore was not within the clause which makes the risks, or one of the risks, begin from that event. Whether the learned judge thought that the placing of the wool on board a wharfinger's lighter in the general course of trade at Townsville satisfied the term "waterborne," and so ended one risk or part of the risk, is not clear. At any rate the Chief Justice thought that the risk "from sheep's back until waterborne" which is expressed to be included in the risk from Townsville to London, did not attach because the jury had found that the loss was caused by collision, and not through fire or flood. Assuming that the plaintiffs were bound to pay, the court held, on the authority of Simpson v. Thomson, 3 App. Cas. 279, 26 W. R. Dig. 219, that they could not by mere force of subrogation sue in their own names. But they held that this right was conferred by the bank's express assignment, aided by the terms of section 5, sub-section 6, of the Judicature Act, 40 Vict. c. 86. That Act follows exactly the English Judicature Act of 1873. The learned judges below consider that the term "legal chose in action" includes all rights the assignment of which a court of law or equity would before the Act have considered lawful, and that the right in question is a right of that kind. On those grounds they sustained the judgment, except as to the amount of damages.

The Government have now appealed to her Majesty in Council claiming that the suit shall be dismissed. They argue that the loss sued on was not within the terms of the insurance; that the plaintiffs stand in the position of mere strangers making a voluntary payment to the bank, and bringing a lawsuit; and that they have no title which a court either of law or of equity would recognize. They make the subordinate objection that the plaintiffs cannot sue in their own name; but Mr. Cohen's arguments go the whole length of denying that the plaintiffs acquired any right at all; and, indeed, in the face of the Judicature Act, they must go that length in order to sustain the subordinate objection.

To their lordships it seems a very startling proposition to say that when insurers and insured have settled a claim of loss between themselves, a third party who caused the loss may insist on ripping up the settlement, and on putting in a plea for the insurers which they did not think it right to put in for themselves; and all for the purpose of availing himself of a highly technical rule of law which has no bearing upon his own wrongful act. It is not alleged that there was anything but perfect good faith in the claim made by the bank and satisfied by the insurance company. It is not alleged that the question of negligence has not been as fully and fairly tried in this action as it could have been in an action by the bank; or that the Government has been in any way prejudiced by the form of the action. But it is claimed as a matter of positive law that, in order to sue for damage done to insured goods, insurers must show that if they had disputed their liability the claim of the insured must have been made good against them. If that be good law, the consequence would be that insurers could never admit a claim on which dispute might be raised except at the risk of finding themselves involved in the very dispute they have tried to avoid, by persons who have no interest in that dispute, but who are sued as being the authors of the loss. The proposition is, as their lordships believe, as novel as it is startling; at least Mr. Cohen was unable to furnish any authority for it, and they know of none. Yet it is difficult to suppose that such cases have not frequently occurred.

As regards the question whether the loss was or was not within the terms of the policy, their lordships will make no observation but this, that whatever might have been the result of a dispute between the parties to it, there is nothing to suggest that the claim was not one which the insured might not honestly and reasonably make, or to which the insurers might not honestly and reasonably accede. They will assume, as the court below has assumed, that the bank could not by the terms of the policy have compelled the insurers to indemnify them. Still if, on a claim being made, the insurers treat it as within the contract, by what right can a stranger say that it is not so? The payment would not be made if no policy existed; and it seems to their lordships an extravagant thing to say that a payment made under such circumstances is a voluntary payment made by a stranger, and that it would be at least an excess of refinement to hold that it is not a payment on the policy, carrying with it the legal incidents of such a payment. Such settlements of claims between the parties concerned ought not to be reopened for a by-purpose at the instance of parties not concerned. To hold otherwise would convert rules of law framed for the purpose of checking speculations in lawsuits into instruments for promoting lawsuits which the parties interested are wise enough to avoid by agreement. Their lordships have no doubt that if, after receiving payment from the plaintiffs, the bank had got damages from the Government, a court of equity would have treated them as trustees for the plaintiffs to the extent of the payment, nor that if it had been necessary to use the name of the bank a court of equity would have compelled the bank to permit it on the usual terms. Mr. Cohen says that no instance is to be found in the reports where the Court of Chancery has bound a defendant to give his name to be used in an action of tort. Nevertheless it cannot be doubted that insurers often have used the names of the insured to recover damages in tort, and have not heeded whether the payment made on their contracts of indemnity did or did not fall within their strict terms. If the reports are silent, the more probable explanation is that the kind of defence raised in the present case has not commended itself to lawyers.

It is true that subrogation by act of law would not give the insurer a right to sue in a court of law in his own name. But that difficulty is got over by force of the express assignment of the bank's claim, and of the Judicature Act, as the parties must have intended that it should be when they stipulated that nothing in the assignment should authorize the use of the bank's name.

Their lordships do not express any dissent from the views taken in the court below of the construction of the Judicature Act with reference to the term "legal chose in action." They prefer to avoid discussing a question not free from difficulty, and to express no opinion what limitation, if any, should be placed on the literal meaning of that term. They rest their judgment on the broader and simpler ground that a payment honestly made by insurers in consequence of a policy granted by them, and in satisfaction of a claim by the insured, is a claim made under the policy, which entitles the insurers to the remedies available to the insured. On this view the highly artificial defence of the Queensland Government fails, and the appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

Their lordships will humbly advise her Majesty in accordance with this opinion.

MORAN v. PLACE. (a.)

Practice — Probate — Caveat — Action brought against caveator—Married woman—Restraint on anticipation — "Instituting" an action or proceeding — Married Women's Property Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 63), s. 2.

A married woman who enters a caveat in the Probate Registry, and afterwards so insists on her objection to the proving of a will that an action has to be brought against her to have it proved in solemn form, does not "institute" an action or proceeding within the meaning of section 2 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1893; and therefore an order cannot be made for payment out of property of the married woman subject to a restraint on anticipation of costs of the action which she may have been ordered to pay.

Appeal from Barnes, J.

Mrs. Place, the defendant, had entered a caveat in respect of a will of William Moran, her father.

The plaintiff, the executrix named in the will, was ultimately obliged to bring an action against the defendant to have the will proved in solemn form. The plaintiff succeeded in the action, and Barnes, J., ordered the defendant to pay her costs, but refused to make an order, under section 2 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1893, for payment out of property of the defendant subject to a restraint on anticipation, holding that the defendant had not, within the meaning of that section, "instituted" any action or proceeding.

The plaintiff appealed.

Warrington, Q.C., and C. T. Giles, for the appellant, referred to section 2 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1893; Probate Rules, 1862, r. 12 (in Tristram and Coote's Practice, 11th ed., p. 828); In the Goods of Chamberlayne, 15 W. R. 1 P. & D. 311.

Bayford, Q.C., and Durley-Grazebrook, for the respondents, were not called upon.

LINDLEY, L.J., stated the facts, and proceeded:—The question here turns on what is the effect of that caveat. It is not notice to the plaintiff or to anybody in particular, but a notice to the registrar, an officer of the court, not to allow anything to be done by anyone in the matter of the goods of the deceased without notice to the person who lodged the caveat. That certainly does not commence anything; it is impossible to look at that as, in ordinary language, commencing any proceeding. It merely obliges the registrar to tell the party if anybody takes any step in relation to the matter. The next thing is a warning to the caveat; and that warning having been entered the next thing is that somebody begins to stir, that is, in this case, the present plaintiff, and wants to prove a will. That notice being there, the plaintiff has to warn the person who gave it, and then if the caveator intends making a real objection she enters an appearance. If the litigation goes on, the person who wants to prove the will issues a writ and serves it on the caveator. Here there was a litigation between the plaintiff and the defendant, and if we look at that quite apart from all technicalities who is the person who "institutes" those proceedings? I think it is the person who is the actor from the beginning in the litigation, that is, the plaintiff. He is so treated when appearance is entered, and he is so treated when those proceedings are followed up by a writ. Though the person who enters the caveat causes the litigation, she does not institute the proceedings. She causes somebody else to institute proceedings against her, that being the real fact of the case.

Let us go now to the Act of Parliament which we have to apply, that is the 2nd section of the Married Women's Property Act, 1893. [The lord justice read the section, and continued:] Now then, can it be said that Mrs. Place, who entered this caveat, and has had these proceedings instituted against her in consequence, has instituted these proceedings? I say no, quite apart from all technicalities. Reliance was placed on expressions in Coplestone v. Nicholes and Peacock v. Lowe. Now I have read the judgment in Peacock v. Lowe I think I see what Sir J. P. Wilde meant when he used those expressions. But when we come to look at the modern practice, I do not think it would now be correct to say, as he there indicates, that there are two ways of commencing a probate action. Ord. 1, r. 1, of the R.S.C., 1883, directs that all suits which formerly were commenced by citation shall be instituted by an action in the High Court, and therefore (ord. 2, r. 1) by writ.

It appears to me therefore that, though it is true Mrs. Place caused these proceedings to be instituted, she did not herself institute them. Personally I am rather sorry for it, but I think that is the result of the settled practice. The appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. [The lord justice stated the facts, and continued:] It is said that Mrs. Place has instituted this action or proceeding. I am unable to take that view. I think the action or proceeding is instituted by writ, and Mrs. Place never could by any possibility be anything but a defendant. It seems to me a contradiction in terms, as it were, to say that a person who can by no possibility be a plaintiff can be the person instituting an action or proceeding. No doubt Mrs. Place had, previously to the writ, taken preliminary steps which led up to the writ; but all that time there was nothing of the nature of a lis pendens. The moment the writ was issued the action or proceeding was commenced, and therefore I think the order appealed from is right.

As to the three cases which were cited to us, all of them were before 1873, the date of the Judicature Act. I do not think those cases are now of any value, because of the provisions of ord. 1, r. 1, of the R.S.C., 1883. When we look at section 100 of the Judicature Act of 1873 we find these words: "Action shall mean a civil proceeding commenced by writ, or in such other manner as may be prescribed by rules of court."

Therefore the conclusion I come to is this, that Mrs. Place by entering a caveat cannot be said to be a person instituting an action or proceeding within the meaning of this section. If that is so, the plaintiff is not entitled to the order for costs which she asks.

KAY, L.J., stated the facts, and proceeded:—It is rather odd to say that a defendant who has lost the suit and been ordered to pay the costs "instituted" the proceedings; but the way in which that is attempted to be made out is this. That lady entered a caveat in the Probate Court. The effect of that is simply that, if any proceedings whatever are taken to propound any will, or otherwise in relation to this estate, she is to have notice. But it does not necessarily mean that she intends to fight. She merely wants information. The next step is that somebody who wants to propound a will warns off the caveat. Even then no litigation has really been begun, because even the caveator's name is not known. She might have used any name—possibly a fictitious name. When the caveat is warned then the person who warns gives his name, I suppose, and intimates, and notice is then given to the person who entered the caveat that there is an intimation, that the person who has warned the caveat means to propound a will, or something of that kind. Still the person who entered the caveat need not fight unless she likes. She need not enter an appearance, but if she enters an appearance she has to give her name. When she has given her name then you have got an intimation that A. B. means to propound a will, and that C. D., who entered the caveat, means to resist probate. But even then, since the Judicature Act, another step must be taken. The person who gave the warning must, as plaintiff, issue a writ against the person who entered the caveat. Then undoubtedly—then, at least—there is a lis pendens, a regular litigation, begun by writ, of A. B. against C. D. It is said that though it is true this married woman was a defendant in the action which was commenced, nevertheless she instituted the proceedings because she entered the caveat, and that the proceedings were commenced by the caveat. We have asked, Does a caveat constitute a lis? It cannot be said that it necessarily does, for when the caveat is entered there is no defendant, no opponent. It is impossible, I think, to say that any lis was commenced by entering a caveat. There might be more reason in saying that when the caveat was warned and an appearance was entered to the warning a lis was commenced. I am not sure that before the Judicature Act that might not have been so. But it is very difficult to say that it was so after the Judicature Act. Since that Act I think the litigation ought to be considered to be commenced by the writ. Certain language of Sir J. P. Wilde in two cases, Coplestone v. Nicholes and Peacock v. Lowe, has been referred to. Both of those cases were before the Judicature Act. No doubt he does say that the ordinary way of taking proceedings in the ecclesiastical courts was by citation; but he adds, "it is plain that it was not the only way." Even in the very judgment in which he used that expression he uses these words: "The executors have propounded a will in a declaration, but no plea has been filed, and it is obvious that until a plea is filed it is impossible to say whether or not the validity of the will is in dispute. The mere entering of a caveat does not show that there is any dispute as to the validity of a will, for it is often entered in order that the person entering it may have notice of the will being proved, without any intention of disputing it, and there is nothing to preclude him from withdrawing his opposition, and allowing the executors to take probate in common form. The validity of the will is not in dispute until the plea is filed." That is absolutely inconsistent with any notion that the learned judge meant that for all purposes a litigation of this kind is begun by a citation. I go farther. The application was to allow the heir at law to be cited, and the learned judge says this: "By the 61st section of the Probate Act (20 & 21 Vict. c. 77) there are two states of things in which the heir at law may be cited, the first being where proceedings are taken to prove a will in solemn form, and the second where, in any contentious cause or matter, the validity of a will is disputed." Now, if a caveat was a "proceeding," or the first step in a proceeding, it would have been the duty of the learned judge to allow the citation to issue on that ground. But he says, in effect: "It is premature to issue this citation to the heir-at-law. I can only do it when the validity of the will is in dispute." He therefore refused to allow it to issue.

On the whole I am clearly of opinion that, since the Judicature Act at any rate, the proceedings do not commence by the citation. That is not the institution of proceedings in any true sense of those words; and I do not think there is any ground for saying that any proceedings are "instituted," within the meaning of the Act, by the mere entry of a caveat in the case. I think the learned judge was quite right, and that the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed with costs; costs to be set off against the costs of the action payable by defendant to plaintiff.

Contract—Option to purchase within limited time—Exercise within time by unauthorized agent—Exercise after time by authorized person—Owner of unsound mind—Ratification.

A. and B. agreed by articles of partnership that if either partner should die the other might purchase the deceased partner's share on certain terms upon giving to his legal representative notice within three months from the death. A. died during the partnership. B. had meanwhile become of unsound mind. Just before the time for the exercise of the option expired C., purporting, but without authority, to act for B., gave notice to purchase A.'s share. Shortly after the time expired B.'s committees, pursuant to an order in lunacy, gave a similar notice.

Held, that neither of the above notices was effectual, and that the doctrine of ratification had no application to such a case.

By an indenture dated in 1892 the defendant and the plaintiffs' testator agreed to be partners in the trade of dairymen, under articles which provided that if either partner should die the other might purchase the deceased partner's share in the partnership without paying anything for goodwill, upon giving to his legal representative notice in writing within three calendar months from the death. The articles provided for the realization of the assets of the partnership if no arrangement was made under the foregoing provision.

The testator died during the partnership on the 5th of April, 1895, having appointed the plaintiffs his executors. The defendant was then and now a person of unsound mind not so found by inquisition.

On the 4th of July, 1895, notice in writing of the defendant's intention to purchase the testator's share of the said business, signed by the solicitor for the defendant, was served on the plaintiffs. It did not appear that the solicitor was authorized to give this notice.

Under an order in lunacy of the 23rd of July, 1895, and upon a certificate of the 2nd of August, 1895, another notice for the same purpose was on the 8th of August, 1895, served on the plaintiffs.

This was an action for a declaration that neither of the above notices was valid, and for realization of the partnership assets, an account, and a receiver. The defendant counterclaimed for specific performance of the option. The question was whether under these circumstances either of the said notices was valid.

Farwell, Q.C., and T. L. Wilkinson, for the plaintiffs.—Neither of the two notices was effectual. There was no authority to give the first, and the second being after the time for the exercise of the option cannot be supported as a ratification of the first: Holland v. King, 6 C. B. 727; Doe v. Goldwin, 2 Q. B. 143. Bolton v. Lambert, 37 W. R. 434, 41 Ch. D. 295, is distinguishable, and Bird v. Brown, 4 Ex. 786, is in favour of the plaintiffs.

Farwell replied.

CHITTY, J., after stating the facts, continued:—It is settled that there is no difference between the rule in equity and at law as to an option of this nature, the option must be exercised before the expiration of the time for which it is expressed to be given both at law and in equity.

It was admitted at the bar, and it is plain, that the notice first given was of no validity when given. But the parties interested on behalf of the surviving partner took proceedings in lunacy, and obtained an order authorizing his committees to give notice on his behalf. Pursuant thereto the committees gave what would have been a sufficient notice if it had been in time, which it was not. It is now said that this amounted to ratification of the notice without authority, and had relation back to the time of the invalid notice. If that were so, the result would be that an option which must be finally exercised within a limited time would be well exercised after that time. Bolton v. Lambert was cited in support of that contention. That was a case of an offer accepted by an agent without authority, and the acceptance was afterwards ratified. In the meantime there had been an attempt to withdraw the offer, and the Court of Appeal held that the ratification related back to the acceptance. That was not a case like this, of an option which must be finally exercised within a certain time. There was no time limited for ratification there, and the doctrine as to relating back was properly applicable. The Court of Appeal did not purport to overrule common law decisions of great weight which have been referred to in the argument before me, and Cotton, L.J., mentioned one (Bird v. Brown) in his judgment for the purpose of distinction. Of those cases Holland v. King comes first. An option was there conferred on the executor or administrator of a deceased partner of succeeding to his share in the business on giving notice within a time named to the surviving partners. The widow of one of the partners gave notice within the time; but she was not then his legal representative, and did not become so until after the time had expired. The court certified to the Vice-Chancellor that the notice was not given within the time limited in the option. The court proceeded on the ground that the notice must be effectual within the time, and that no subsequent ratification was valid. Maule, J., said during the argument: "The right of option is given . . . upon the express condition that it shall be exercised within three calendar months after the death. If the notice here given be held to be an effective notice, the consequence will be that the widow might have given a notice that would have bound the surviving partners, and then might have waited for a longer period than three months to see if it was worth while to avail herself of it" (6 C. B., p. 740).

Doe v. Goldwin related to notice to quit which would operate at common law to terminate a tenancy, and it was held that the notice to quit must be one which the tenant might safely act on, and consequently that a notice by an unauthorized agent cannot be made good by an adoption of it by the principal after the proper time for giving it.

These two cases have an immediate bearing on this, because the time was held to be of essential value, and the doctrine of relation back did not apply.

Bird v. Brown, which was distinguished, as I have said, by Cotton, L.J., in Bolton v. Lambert, and was referred to as an ordinary case by Bowen, L.J., in In re Portuguese Consolidated Copper Mines, Ex parte Badman, was a case of stoppage in transitu. Rolfe, B., said: " . . . . . the real question . . . . is whether the ratification by Illins after a conversion by the defendants can have the effect of altering retrospectively the ownership of the goods, so as to prevent the plaintiffs from saying that the goods were theirs at the time of the conversion which, if no subsequent ratification had occurred, certainly were theirs at that time, and would have so continued. We are of opinion that the ratification by Illins had no such effect" (4 Ex., at p. 798). To allow the exercise of the option here would not alter the whole contract, but would make a material alteration in it, so as to bring the case within Bird v. Brown. The ratification did not relate back there, as Rolfe, B., said, and he explained under what circumstances ratification did relate back. That applies to the case before me. Then he mentioned Lord Audley's case. Bird v. Brown is in favour of the plaintiffs.

I must hold that the option has not been validly exercised, and it makes no difference that the person to exercise it was of unsound mind. It is impossible to hold that an unauthorized agent could exercise such an option as this so as to bind a person incompetent to exercise the option himself.

GRAHAM v. DRUMMOND. (a.)

Executor—Executor and residuary legatee—Equitable charge of assets by executor or legatee—Creditor of testator—Notice—Priority—Right to follow assets.

Where an executor, who is also residuary legatee, by a legal or equitable assignment and for valuable consideration transfers assets to a person who has no notice of the existence of unsatisfied debts of the testator, or of circumstances rendering such conduct on the part of such executor improper, and such transferee has given proper notice of his charge, such assignment will hold good against the unsatisfied creditors of the testator.

Trial of action.

This was an action for a declaration that the plaintiff, Henry Arthur Graham, was entitled under a certain memorandum of charge to a charge upon all the securities of Catherine Mary Champagné, which at the date of such memorandum had been legally transferred to the defendants George J. Drummond and Edgar A. Drummond, and (the securities having now been realized), that he was entitled to a charge on the proceeds of sale thereof. The facts of the case were as follow.

Under a marriage settlement, dated the 13th of November, 1878, made on the marriage of Mary Dorcas Champagné, daughter of Mr. Arthur Henry Champagné, since deceased, to a Mr. George Philips, the said A. H. Champagné covenanted with the trustees thereof that he, his heirs, executors, or administrators, would during the lives of himself and his wife, the said Catherine M. Champagné, and the life of the survivor of them, in case the said G. Philips and Mary Dorcas, his wife, or either of them, or any issue of their then intended marriage should so long live, pay to the trustees or trustee of the said settlement the sum of £300 a year, clear of all deductions, to be held by them on the trusts therein declared. A similar settlement, dated the 31st of August, 1882, was made on the marriage of Blanche Jane Champagné (another daughter of the said A. H. Champagné) to a Mr. H. A. Weatherall, which contained a covenant for the payment of an annuity of £300 a year on the same terms and on trusts similar to those in the former settlement. At the date of the action the said George Philips and certain issue of the marriage were living. Captain and Mrs. Weatherall were also alive.

By his will, dated the 6th of April, 1864, the said A. H. Champagné gave all his estate and effects whatsoever and wheresoever to his wife, the said C. M. Champagné, for her absolute use and benefit, and appointed her sole executrix of his will. The said A. H. Champagné died on the 9th of December, 1882, and his will was duly proved by the said C. M. Champagné on the 31st of January, 1883.

By a series of indentures, of which the first was dated the 20th of December, 1892, the said C. M. Champagné charged certain stocks, shares, and securities to which she was beneficially entitled under the said will with the payment of certain sums of money secured by the said indentures to Mr. G. J. and Mr. E. A. Drummond, bankers, Charing Cross, London.

In December, 1892, Mrs. Champagné applied to the plaintiff to discount certain bills, and executed in his favour the following memorandum of charge:

"27, Chancery-lane, W.C., London,
Dec. 28, 1892.

"To H. A. Graham, Esq.

"Dear Sir,—In consideration of your discounting four joint and several promissory notes of myself, Captain and Mrs. Weatherall, all dated this day, for £1,000, £1,000, £700, and £297 respectively, I hereby charge to secure the repayment thereof all my securities now in the hands of Messrs. Drummond, bankers, Charing Cross, and now charged by them to secure an aggregate sum of about £53,000 advanced by them to me. I hereby agree on demand to execute to you a legal mortgage upon the said securities in the same form (so far as is practicable) as the charge I have given as aforesaid to Messrs. Drummond to secure to you the repayment of the said promissory notes; and in the meantime and until such legal charge is executed, this letter is to be considered as such legal charge, and to be taken, read, and construed as if such legal charge had been given in the form aforesaid, and this letter is to confer all rights, powers, and remedies as such legal charge would give when executed.

"Yours faithfully,

"(Signed) CATHERINE M. CHAMPAGNE."

The plaintiff discounted the notes, and also gave notice of the memorandum of charge to Messrs. Drummond.

Mr. E. A. Drummond died on the 10th of May, 1893. On the 31st of July, 1893, Mrs. Champagné was adjudicated a bankrupt, and Mr. G. J. Drummond, as surviving mortgagee of the above-mentioned securities, sold the same. After the liabilities to the Messrs. Drummond had been satisfied there remained in the hands of the said defendant, Mr. G. J. Drummond, the sum of £3,022 10s. 10d. To this sum the trustees of the marriage settlement of Captain and Mrs. Weatherall laid claim, as also did the plaintiff and other persons. Mr. G. J. Drummond accordingly refused to pay over the money to the plaintiff, who accordingly brought this action, in which Mr. G. J. Drummond and the various claimants were defendants. Mr. G. J. Drummond thereupon paid the money into court to the credit of the action.

The said trustees submitted that the securities in question were held by Mrs. Champagné as executrix of her husband, and were subject to his debts. They further submitted that she had no power to charge them as she had purported to do by the memorandum in question, as she had made no provision for the payment of the debt due to the trustees of the marriage settlement. They further submitted that if the memorandum in any way constituted a valid charge it was only valid as a charge on the beneficial interest remaining after provision had been made out of the assets of the testator for the payment of his debts. They counter-claimed for a declaration that they were entitled as creditors of the testator to payment of their debts from the sum, and that the sum might be carried to the account of another action in the Chancery Division in which the testator's estate was being administered. The plaintiff denied that he had had any notice of the defendants' claim.

Neville, Q.C., A. à B. Terrell, and B. A. Hull, for the plaintiff.—If an executor disposes of the assets of the creditor for valuable consideration, they cannot be followed by a creditor, whether they were legal or equitable: Nugent v. Giffard, 1 Atk. 463. In that case, as in the present, the executor was a residuary legatee, although that does not appear on the report: see McLeod v. Drummond, 17 Ves. 152. They also referred to Mead v. Lord Orrery, 3 Atk. 235. If a man buys from an executor he is not affected by the mere fact that the executor is misapplying the money, unless there is some evidence to show him that the executor intends to misapply such money: Taner v. Ivie, 2 Ves. Sen., 466; McLeod v. Drummond. By giving notice to the Messrs Drummond, the legal mortgagees, the plaintiff did all that was necessary to perfect his title.

Eve, Q.C., and R. J. Parker, for the trustee defendants.—The plaintiff is not entitled to any priority because he gave notice before the trustees gave it. Dearle v. Hall, 3 Russ. 1, does not apply to the case. Even if it did, it would not help the plaintiff, as the trustees gave notice at the proper time. As soon as a notice is given it attaches to the funds, and cannot be affected by any fresh dealings therewith, as by the appointment of new trustees: Ward v. Duncombe, 42 W. R. 59, [1893] A. C. 369. As creditors we have at law an equity to the testator's assets, and it is not an equity that can be affected by a notice to a prior incumbrancer: Feltham v. Clark, 1 De G. & Sm. 307. In Re Morgan, Pilligrem v. Pilligrem, 30 W. R. 223, it was held that although the mortgagee did not know that the executor mortgagor was an executor, it would not protect him as against the creditors of the estate. They also referred to Dilkes v. Broadmead, 9 W. R. 238, 2 De G. F. & J. 566; Ricketts v. Lewis, 30 W. R. 609, 20 Ch. D. 745; Noble v. Brett, 6 W. R. 219, 24 Beav. 499; Hooper v. Smart, 24 W. R. 152, 1 Ch. D. 90. There is no authority for the proposition that an equitable purchaser or incumbrancer can set up a purchase for value without notice.

E. N. Bullen, for another defendant, Owles.

Neville, Q.C., in reply.—There is no foundation for the distinction that is here attempted to be made between legal and equitable assets. In McLeod v. Drummond the Master of the Rolls says, 14 Ves., p. 360: "I do not find that any difference has been made between the power of an executor to dispose in any manner of equitable assets and his power to dispose of legal assets."

ROMER, J.—The point of law which I have to consider arises under the following circumstances.

Mrs. Champagné was sole executrix and legatee under her husband's will. Several years after his death, in order to secure a debt of her own to Messrs. Drummond, she transferred certain railway stocks forming part of his estate into their names. Subsequently, in order to secure a liability of her own, she gave a charge on the stocks in favour of the plaintiff. Messrs. Drummond and the plaintiff respectively, when they obtained their charges on the stocks, had no knowledge or notice that any debt of the husband remained unpaid, or that Mrs. Champagné was not in every respect entitled to deal with the stocks as she did. The plaintiff gave notice of his charge to Messrs. Drummond long before they or he had any notice that any debt of the husband remained unpaid. This is an action by the plaintiff to enforce his security. Messrs. Drummond have sold the stocks, and, after paying out of the proceeds their own secured debt, have paid the balance into court in this action. It now appears that the defendants Philips, Close, and Lowe, as trustees of a certain marriage settlement, are unsatisfied creditors of the husband, and they claim as such creditors to have a right to the fund in court superior to the plaintiff's claim, and to have that fund transferred to the credit of another action in this division, in which the estate of the husband is being administered by the court.

The question before me is whether under the circumstances above stated this claim of the trustees is well founded. In my opinion it is not, and for the following reasons. I think it is settled law that if an executor who is also residuary legatee sells or mortgages an asset of the testator for valuable consideration to a person who has no notice of the existence of unsatisfied debts of the testator, or of any ground which rendered it improper for the executor so to deal with the asset, that person's purchase or mortgage is valid against any unsatisfied creditor of the testator. The cases showing this are numerous and of long standing. In the first place, there are two decisions of Lord Hardwicke. The first of these is Nugent v. Giffard. To understand that case a fact must be borne in mind which does not appear in the report—viz., that the executor was also sole legatee. This fact appears in a statement in 4 Bro. Ch. Cas. 136, and is mentioned by Lord Eldon in McLeod v. Drummond. The second case is Mead v. Lord Orrery, and the real ground on which it was decided and is to be supported was that one of the three executors there dealing with the asset was one of the residuary legatees, and that the person dealing in good faith with them was entitled to assume that the executors assented to that asset being treated as part of the residuary share of the legatee. These cases were followed by Sir William Grant, M.R.'s, decision in Taylor v. Hawkins (8 Ves. 209) where he pointed out the necessity that the assignee or mortgagee of the asset should have no express notice of the existence of unsatisfied debts of the testator. And the principle has been recognized and followed in Whale v. Booth, 4 Term Rep. 625, note a, and Storry v. Walsh, 2 W. R. 300, 18 Beav. 559, and has been stated for a considerable time as established law in leading textbooks dealing with the subject.

But it is now said on behalf of the creditors here that the principle of law I have stated is limited to cases where the assignee or mortgagee of the asset obtains the legal estate in or legal control over that asset. It is said that where the assignment or mortgage only confers an equitable interest in the asset, then that equitable interest is subject to the prior equitable right of the unsatisfied creditors, and, of course, if this contention were correct, then the principle could never apply to an equitable asset. Now, I cannot find that up to the present time it has ever been contended or suggested that the principle is so limited, and I do not think it ought to be. In the reported cases the question whether the asset was equitable or whether the purchaser or mortgagee had acquired a legal estate, or its equivalent in case of chattels personal, has never been treated or referred to as being important; and so far as authority goes it is against the limitation contended for, inasmuch as Nugent v. Giffard was a case where the asset was an equitable, and not a legal term of years. And in McLeod v. Drummond, 14 Ves., at p. 360, Sir William Grant, M.R., though he was there dealing with the ordinary case of executors borrowing money on security of their testator's assets, makes the following general remarks: "I do not find that any difference has been made between the power of an executor to dispose in any manner of equitable assets and his power to dispose of legal assets. In the case of Nugent v. Giffard it was only the equitable, and not the legal, term that the executor had assigned in payment of a debt of his own, and in Scott v. Tyler, 2 Bro. Ch. Cas. 431, 2 Dick. 712, the bonds, though capable of assignment, were not in fact assigned, and therefore the bankers had not the legal interest; yet it was held that the pledge could be taken from them only upon the ground of implied fraud." Moreover, the reasons given by the judges for the decisions I have above referred to apply equally to legal and equitable assets.

The chief reasons given are that unsatisfied creditors have no lien or charge on any asset, and that persons dealing with the executor in good faith are entitled to look to him alone, and are not bound to ascertain that all debts and liabilities have been discharged. For if they were so bound they would never be safe in dealing for valuable consideration with any asset, even though a considerable time might have elapsed since the testator's death (as happened in the case before me), and so a legatee whose legacy was assented to by the executor would be unfairly and unduly hampered in dealing with it. Further, the case of an executor who is a residuary legatee dealing with an asset is the same in principle as the case of a legatee who is not executor, but whose legacy has been assented to by the executor, and who deals with his legacy for valuable consideration. In the last case unsatisfied creditors have the right to follow the legacy as against the legatee or volunteers claiming through him, but not as against purchasers from the legatee for valuable consideration; and I do not find that this immunity on the part of the purchasers is limited to cases of legal assets, or to cases where the purchasers have obtained the legal estate or its equivalent, and in my judgment it ought not to be so limited.

But, in order to prevent misunderstanding, I desire to point out that the cases I have been considering must not be confused with those where an executor has not so parted with his control over the asset as to prevent his having recourse to it in order to satisfy creditors subsequently appearing. If the executors could have recourse to the asset, so, of course, could the unsatisfied creditors. So if the court administering the testator's estate retains the control over an asset, it can apply it in favour of creditors at any time, notwithstanding that the legatee of the asset may have dealt with it for valuable consideration; for in cases of this class the title acquired by the purchaser from the legatee is really one subject to the right of the executor or of the court, as the case may be, to have the asset applied in satisfaction of any creditors who may appear at any time before the executor or court loses control over it.

In the case now before me Mrs. Champagné, as against the plaintiff, could not possibly have said that she retained the right to disregard the charge which she had given, and to have the assets charged applied in payment of the unsatisfied creditors. The plaintiff's charge was in no way subject to any right or control by the executrix. The stocks charged were transferred to the first mortgagees, who admittedly got a title, and that before they had any notice of the existence of the creditors now claiming. The plaintiff in fact completed his title by giving notice to those having legal control over the assets, and the stocks could, as against him, in no way be reached by the executrix or by the creditors.

For these reasons I think the plaintiff is entitled to the relief he asks. But before parting with the case I ought to say a few words about the authorities cited on behalf of the creditors. Noble v. Brett was a case where the court held that the executor had not parted with his control over the assets, and had retained his right to have recourse to them to satisfy the unsatisfied creditor, and, further, that the assets had come under the control of the court for the purpose of administering the estate of the testator. That these were the grounds of the decision is shown by the passages in the judgment of Sir John Romilly, M.R., at pp. 510, 511, and 512 of the report. Hooper v. Smart was a case where the fund was in the control of the court in an action administering the estate of the testator, and was subject to the right of the court to apply it in payment of any creditor who established his claim before it was paid out; and where, though all known debts of the testator had been paid, the purchasers from the legatees had bought subject to the court's right, as was pointed out by Hall, V.C., at p. 98 (1 Ch. D.) of the report in these words: "This fund remained in court, and the purchasers took subject to the risk that other claims might be brought in and established." Lastly, Re Morgan has no real bearing on the point now before me. That was the case where an executor and trustee held a lease in trust for certain beneficiaries under a will and renewed that lease. Of course he held the renewed lease as trustee. He then, concealing the fact that he was only trustee of the renewed lease, gave an equitable charge on it in favour of a third person, and it was held, under these circumstances, that the third person's charge could not be set up as against the prior equity of the beneficiaries.

May 15.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL (Appellants) v. GROVE, SURVEYOR OF TAXES (Respondent). (a.)

Inland revenue—Income tax—County council—Interest arising on loans—Deductions—16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, Schedule D.

The London County Council, under the powers and provisions of various Acts of Parliament, borrowed large sums of money for their own purposes and for the purpose of lending sums of money to various local bodies. Upon these borrowed sums they paid interest, income tax being deducted by the Bank of England and paid over to the Inland Revenue, and upon the sums they lent they received interest. In 1894 they were served with a notice of assessment under Schedule D of the Income Tax Act (16 & 17 Vict. c. 34) in respect of a sum of £352,021, being interest received by them in the year ending March, 1893, in full without deduction of income tax, upon loans advanced by them.

Held, that the London County Council were properly so assessed. The interest they received was part of their funds and part of the corpus of the property which they enjoyed, and they ought to pay income tax on it.

The London County Council could not be treated as a trading concern so as to bring the money they borrowed, on the one side, and the money they lent, on the other side, into an account.

Special case.

This was a case stated by the General Commissioners of Inland Revenue for the District of St. Martin-in-the-Fields, in the County of London, upon the determination of an appeal to them under the Income Tax Acts, which appeal related to a claim for the payment of Income Tax upon the sum of £352,021 6s. 10d., the interest received in 1892-1893 by the London County Council upon loans advanced by them to the School Board for London, the Managers of the Metropolitan Asylum District, the Receiver for the Metropolitan Police District, and other local bodies, and related to other questions as to sums received by the Commissioners for Inland Revenue in respect of income tax payable in respect of properties assessed under Schedule A.

For many years past the Metropolitan Board of Works and, under the Local Government Act, 1888, their successors, the London County Council, had under and pursuant to certain statutes borrowed money for the purpose of making advances by way of loan to the School Board for London and other local bodies.

By the Metropolitan Board of Works (Loans) Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 102), it was provided that for the purposes therein mentioned the Board might create capital stock, to be called Metropolitan Consolidated Stock, in certain amounts and at certain prices; and by section 5 it was provided that all Consolidated Stock created for the purposes therein mentioned or of any Act thereafter to be passed, and the dividends thereon, and the sums required for redemption thereof, should be charged indifferently on the whole of the lands, rents, and property belonging to the Board under the Acts mentioned in the first schedule to the said Act, and on all moneys which could be raised by the Board by rates under that Act.

By section 26 a fund to be called the Consolidated Loans Fund of the Metropolis was created.

By section 37 it was enacted that the Board should have power to raise money by the creation of Consolidated Stock for the purpose of making the loan to the managers of the Metropolitan Asylum District, and it was enacted that all sums received by the Board from the managers in respect of interest on or the principal of such loan should be carried to the Consolidated Loans Fund.

Section 28 of the above Act relating to the application of the Consolidated Loans Fund was repealed and re-enacted by the London County Council (Money) Act, 1889.

This statute enacted (section 15) that the Consolidated Loans Fund should be first applied in the payment of the dividends on Consolidated Stock, and then in purchasing and redeeming Consolidated Stock, and contained further provisions as to the application of such Consolidated Loans Fund.

From time to time Consolidated Stock was created under and pursuant to the above Acts.

By the Metropolitan Board of Works (Loans) Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 37), it was provided (section 2) that the Act should be read and have effect as one with the Metropolitan Board of Works (Loans) Act, 1869. The Board were thereby authorized to create a specified amount of Consolidated Stock to lend to various public bodies sums of money to a specified amount, in addition to sums previously lent to such public bodies respectively. The Act, by section 10, further provided that where a vestry or district board desired to borrow money for certain specified purposes, then from time to time up to the 31st of December, 1879, the Board might lend to such vestry or district board, and the vestry or district board might borrow, such money as the Board thought fit, and the vestry or district board were authorized and desired to borrow.

By section 11 power was given to lend £200,000 to boards of guardians, and for that purpose to create Consolidated Stock.

By section 23 it was provided that all sums received by the Board for interest on or principal of any loan made by them under the Act should be carried to the Consolidated Loans Fund.

Under the powers and provisions of this statute Consolidated Stock to the amount of £2,150,000 was on the 5th of May, 1879, created and issued. Upon this stock interest after the rate of 3½ per cent. per annum was payable. The sum of £12,000 was lent by the Board to the Vestry of the parish of Bermondsey.

By the Metropolitan Board of Works (Money) Act, 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. 50), it was provided that the said Act should be read and have effect as one with the Metropolitan Board of Works (Loans) Acts, 1869 to 1871, and the Metropolitan Board of Works (Money) Acts, 1875 to 1883.

This Act provided for the creation and issue of Consolidated Stock for certain specified purposes. By sections 12 and 13 it was provided that the Board might from time to time during the year ending the 31st of December, 1885, lend to the School Board for London such sums as such Board was authorized to borrow, not exceeding in the whole the sum of £700,000, and that the Metropolitan Board might in order to raise money for such purpose create Consolidated Stock, and that the moneys so lent should be repaid to them by the School Board with interest as therein set forth. It was (section 21) provided that all sums received by the Board in respect of interest on or principal of any loan made by them under the said Act should be carried to the Consolidated Loans Fund.

Under the powers and provisions of this statute Consolidated Stock to the amount of £1,750,000 was on the 20th of May, 1885, created and issued. Upon this stock interest at the rate of £3 per centum per annum was and still is payable. On the 9th of October, 1885, the sum of £150,000 was lent by the Board to the said School Board for London.

Under the powers and provisions of Acts of Parliament enacted in each of the years 1869 to 1871 and 1875 to 1892 the Metropolitan Board of Works and their successors, the London County Council, respectively continued to lend sums of money to the School Board for London, the Managers of the Metropolitan Asylum District, the Receiver for the Metropolitan Police District, and other local bodies, and created and issued Consolidated Stock for the purpose of raising such money. The total amount of money so raised and lent amounted on the 31st of March, 1892, to the sum of £6,674,751.

Up to the year 1881 the Metropolitan Board of Works had applied money from the Consolidated Loans Fund in the redemption of debt by repaying old outstanding loans raised prior to the creation of Metropolitan Consolidated Stock in 1869. The Metropolitan Board of Works up to this time had always created new stock in order to raise the moneys required for the loans to local bodies in each year under the various money Acts hereinbefore mentioned.

By the Metropolitan Board of Works (Money) Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 48), it was provided (section 20) that the Board might for the purpose of making loans, instead of raising money by the creation of Consolidated Stock, use for any such loan any moneys for the time being forming part of the Consolidated Loans Fund and not required for the payment of dividends on Consolidated Stock.

The Metropolitan Board of Works (Money) Acts enacted in each of the years 1882 and 1883 contain a similar provision.

From and after the year 1881 the Metropolitan Board of Works and its successors, the London County Council, in pursuance of the Acts above mentioned, used, in addition to moneys raised by issue of Metropolitan Consolidated Stock, for the purpose of loans to the School Board for London, the Managers of the Metropolitan Asylum District, and other local bodies, moneys forming part of the Consolidated Loans Fund and not required for the payment of dividends on Consolidated Stock.

The total loans outstanding on the 31st of March, 1893, amounted to £10,297,675 8s. 2d.

The total nominal amount of the Consolidated Stock existing on the 31st of March, 1892, was £28,811,637.

The sum of £352,021 6s. 10d. was the aggregate amount paid to the London County Council in the year 1892-3 by the Managers of the Metropolitan Asylum District, the Receiver for the Metropolitan Police District, and other local bodies, respectively, for interest upon money advanced by the Metropolitan Board of Works and the London County Council to the local bodies above mentioned under the provisions of the statutes hereinbefore mentioned.

The said amount of £352,021 6s. 10d. exceeded the corresponding interest payable upon the Consolidated Stock created and issued by the Metropolitan Board of Works and the London County Council by the sum of about £25,000, but the London County Council incurred further expenses in the issue, management, and redemption of the loans amounting to £10,000.

The interest payable upon the Consolidated Stock so created and issued as aforesaid was paid by the Bank of England, as the bankers of the London County Council, to the stockholders, and the Bank of England deducted from the interest payable to each stockholder income tax at the authorized rate, and paid over the balance of such interest to the stockholders respectively. The aggregate of the sums so deducted by the Bank of England was paid over to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, and no part thereof was paid by the Bank of England to the London County Council.

On the 12th day of July, 1894, the London County Council were served with a notice of additional first assessment under Schedule D of the Income Tax Acts made by the commissioners for putting into execution the Income Tax Acts in respect of the sum of £352,021 6s. 10d.

Up to this date income tax on such amount had not been demanded or paid.

The London County Council contended (1) that no duty was payable in respect of the sum of £352,021 6s. 10d., but only such part of it as was profit (if any); (2) that if the duty was payable on such sum or any part thereof, then the London County Council were entitled for their own benefit to a sum equal to such duty out of the income tax deducted by the Bank of England from the interest payable to holders of Consolidated Stock, which the said Bank of England paid over to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

The London County Council are the owners and occupiers of certain lands, tenements, and hereditaments within the parish of St. Martin-in-the-Fields.

Such lands, tenements, and hereditaments were purchased either by the London County Council or their predecessors, the Metropolitan Board of Works, with money borrowed under the provisions of various Acts of Parliament. All the Consolidated Stock of the London County Council, and the dividends thereon, are charged upon the whole of these properties. The London County Council receive nothing in respect of any of such lands, tenements, and hereditaments, except rent in respect of such as are in the occupation of tenants.

Up to the year 1891 the commissioners annually returned or allowed to the London County Council a sum equal to the amount of duty deducted from or paid on the rents received by the London County Council.

In May, 1894, the London County Council were served with notices of assessment under Schedule A of the Income Tax Acts made by the commissioners for putting into force the Income Tax Acts in respect of the said lands, tenements, and hereditaments, which, together with the duty claimed thereon, are described in Schedules A and B to this case.

The London County Council contended (1) that no duty was payable by them in respect of such lands, tenements, and hereditaments; (2) that if such duty was payable, they were entitled for their own benefit to a sum equal to such duties out of the income tax deducted by the Bank of England from the interest payable to holders of Consolidated Stock, and paid over to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue; (3) that they were entitled for their own benefit to a sum equal to the amount of duty deducted from the rent payable to the London County Council in respect of so much of the said lands, tenements, and hereditaments as were not in their occupation.

It was contended by the surveyor of taxes on behalf of the Crown that each of the hereditaments in question had been duly inserted in the valuation list of the parish where situated.

The charging schedule of the Act of 1853 runs thus:—

Section 2. Schedule A.

"For and in respect of the property in all lands, tenements, hereditaments, and heritages in the United Kingdom, and to be charged for every twenty shillings of the annual value thereof."

That by rule 1, section 60, 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, "all lands, tenements, hereditaments, or heritages capable of actual occupation, of whatever nature and for whatever purpose occupied or enjoyed, and of whatever value, are chargeable on their annual value."

That the fact of the Council deriving, as alleged, no pecuniary profits from the occupation of such properties as the Sewer Cottage, the Fire Brigade stations, and properties of a similar character does not affect the liability of the London County Council to income tax in respect of such properties, for the reason that the test of liability to income tax under Schedule A is not profit, but annual value.

That the assessment on the London County Council under Schedule D of £352,021 for 1892-3 was in respect of interest received by the Council in the year ended the 31st of March, 1893, in full, without deduction of income tax.

That the assessment was made under the charging schedule of the Act 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, s. 2, Schedule D. The words are: "And for and in respect of all interest of money, annuities, and other annual profits and gains not charged by virtue of any of the other schedules contained in this Act."

That this interest was also chargeable under the first clause of section 102 of the Act 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35. The words are: "Upon all annuities, yearly interest of money, or other annual payments, either as a charge on any property of the person paying the same by virtue of any deed or will or otherwise, or as a reservation thereout, or as a personal debt or obligation by virtue of any contract, or whether the same shall be received and payable half-yearly, or at any shorter or more distant periods, there shall be charged for every twenty shillings of the annual amount thereof the sum of seven pence."

That by the 40th section of the last-named Act it was enacted as follows: "All bodies politic, corporate, or collegiate, companies, fraternities, fellowships, or societies of persons, whether corporate or not corporate, shall be chargeable with such and the like duties as any person will under and by virtue of this Act be chargeable with.

That all annual interest received by the Council in full without deduction of tax is chargeable with income tax, and should have been returned to the assessor for the parish by the Council for assessment, and that the sum of £352,021 of untaxed interest received by the Council in the year ended the 31st of March, 1893, was duly and properly assessed.

That the assessments under Schedule A and Schedule D of the income tax on the lands, tenements, and hereditaments belonging to the Council, and on the untaxed interest received by the Council, having due regard to the assessment at the Bank of England in respect of the income tax deducted from and borne by the recipients of the dividends on the Consolidated Stock, did not constitute a double assessment within the provisions of section 171 of 5 and 6 Vict. c. 35 and section 60 of the Taxes Management Act of 1880. That the major part of the security for the Consolidated Stock was the county rate, and not the lands, rents, and property of the Council; whereas the interest on the stock which had been paid by the Council was assessable under the specific provision of section 102 of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, and such interest had been so assessed on the Bank of England.

The commissioners decided (1) that in point of law the whole of the duty, amounting to the sum of £10,267 5s. 7d., was payable by the London County Council; (2) that the London County Council was liable to the duty assessed in respect of the lands, tenements, and hereditaments under Schedule A; (3) that the London County Council was not entitled to the return of any such duty as claimed.

The London County Council appealed.

Sir E. Clarke, Q.C., Bosanquet, Q.C., and English Harrison, for the appellants; Sir R. Webster, A.G., and Danckwerts, for the respondent.

The arguments of counsel sufficiently appear above and in the following judgment.

POLLOCK, B.—In this case it appears to me that the Crown are entitled to judgment. Now, this special case states that it is a claim made by the Crown for the payment of income tax upon the sum of £352,021 6s. 10d., and that amount is arrived at as being interest received in 1892-1893 by the London County Council, the appellants, upon loans advanced by them to the School Board, the Metropolitan Asylum District, the Receiver for the Metropolitan Police District, and other local bodies.

It appears that by different Acts of Parliament this vast body, which is now the London County Council, and those who preceded it has a power, first, of borrowing money for their own purposes and paying interest upon that, the interest being charged upon their property, the land that they occupied, and also upon the rates which they had the power of raising by Parliamentary powers. In later years it was found convenient that they should not only have that power of borrowing which the old Metropolitan Board of Works had, and which every public body of this kind must have, but that it would be a great convenience to other boards, such as the School Board, the Metropolitan Asylum District Board, and others, that they should have the power to borrow for other purposes, and accordingly large sums were borrowed by the London County Council upon which they paid interest. Large sums were lent by the London County Council to different local boards, and then there came a period when those sums that were lent were repaid, and therefore the balance of accounts is much more in favour of the London County Council than it was at the beginning.

The sums in question became payable in the two years 1892-1893. It is provided by the Act of Parliawhich we are dealing with now that the London County Council and all corporations are to be in the same position as individuals, and it is also found as a fact that the assessment which is complained of of the London County Council under Schedule D, of £352,021, "is in respect of interest received by the Council in the year ended the 31st of March, 1893, in full without the deduction of income tax." That, therefore, is clear. They received this sum as interest. No sum is deducted by those who paid that interest, as is usual in such cases. It appears that the London County Council for some reason desire that it should be paid in full, and the question is whether they are entitled to deduct that sum, including the income tax, which beyond all doubt the borrowers of the money, when they paid income tax, ought to have deducted and would have deducted under ordinary circumstances before they paid it.

I think the whole difficulty that has arisen here has been caused by Sir Edward Clarke's ingenious dealing with the case, which he has presented as if it were a case of profit and loss arising out of some large bank or mercantile body who were dealing with money, borrowing on the one side, and paying out on the other, and incurring certain expenses which would have to be deducted, and then making up a sort of profit and loss account, and saying, "We are to pay upon the balance of the net profits upon that account." But in truth that is absolutely foreign to the consideration of the present case. In the present case the assessment is made under the charging schedule, which is Schedule D of 16 and 17 Vict. c. 34, s. 2, which has these words: "And for and in respect of all interest of money, annuities, and other annual profits and gains not charged by virtue of any of the other schedules contained in this Act."

Now, here the question is whether this is an interest which is payable quite apart from any question of annual profits. It is pointed out first by Lord Esher, M.R., in the case of The Clerical, Medical, and General Life Society v. Carter, 37 W. R. 346, 22 Q. B. D. 444, that it is quite sufficient to say that the words in this Schedule D are perfectly plain, and are to be construed, as all other words are in an Act of Parliament, according to their ordinary meaning, unless that construction, applied to the subject matter with which they are dealing, would lead to some gross and manifest absurdity. This is not so in the present case, because here, so far from leading to a manifest absurdity, the construction put upon this schedule in that case, and which we are now putting upon it, is entirely in accordance with the scheme of the whole Act throughout. How that word "interest" came to be used, instead of mere profits, is described in the very interesting note by Mr. Dowell in his book, which seems to say that it is only found by reverting to some of the older Acts in the last century, where the same sort of language was used, but which somehow slipped out of the intermediate Acts. But there we find it, and there we must deal with it, and, to my mind, nothing can be more extravagant than to suppose that we ought to deal with this London County Council as if it were a trading corporation. Then how does the matter rest? This income tax is income tax that is payable by the London County Council as the recipients of interest; it is a part of their funds which they have received, it is a part of the corpus of the property which they enjoy, and they ought to pay it. But they say, "We, on our side, when we are the borrowers, and when we are paying our interest to those who lend us the money, stop the income tax through our bankers," and accordingly the Bank of England, who act for them, as bankers do in the ordinary case where interest or dividends are paid, stop the income tax which is due upon the interest so payable. But whose income tax is that? That is not the income tax which is to be levied upon the London County Council. Instead of being any advantage or profit to them, it is a debt they are paying, and they are paying it to persons who have lent them that money, and who are being paid through the bankers in accordance with the practice which has been adopted for many years in the collection of all these income taxes. The Government go to the source, and they say, "Instead of going round to each person who receives a dividend warrant from the London County Council or the Bank of England, their bankers, and asking the recipient for the income tax, we will go to the London County Council, and say, 'You must pay your creditors minus the income tax, and you must pay that to us.'" But that is in no sense a payment upon their property. As I have said before, it is a payment upon the property of the persons who are receiving the dividend. That is, therefore, foreign altogether to this matter.

It was argued that if you could treat the London County Council as a trading concern, and bring all the money they borrowed on one side, and all the money they lent upon the other, into an account, treating it as a trading account or a bankers' account, then a different result would be produced as to the actual financial condition, and you could treat them as annuities payable, or interest payable, or money borrowed on the one side, and annuities or interest on money lent on the other side. It never has been so treated that, because a man has £1,000 a year and he chooses to charge £300 upon it by granting an annuity to a relative or to a money lender for a money consideration, that therefore he is to say: "My income is only £700, because I have charged the other with an annuity." That is not the mode in which the income tax gets at people's property. If they have property, they may deal with it as they like; but so long as that property is theirs within the schedules of this Act they must pay income tax upon it. This seems to me to be so clearly declared and acted upon in The Clerical, Medical, and General Life Society v. Carter, and also in The Gresham Life Insurance Co. v. Styles in the House of Lords (41 W. R. 270, [1892] A. C. 309), especially in the judgment of Lord Watson, that I think it would be really only waste of time to argue all the different points which are alluded to here. It seems to me that this case stands on those clear and simple principles, and that if we were to decide otherwise we should be making not only an exception from the language of the Income Tax Acts which does not exist, but altogether inventing a theory of dealing with this taxation which has never been suggested before.

It seems to me therefore that our judgment in this case ought to be for the Crown, with costs.

BRUCE, J.—I am of the same opinion.

REG. v. THE JUSTICES OF KENT AND OTHERS. (a.)

Licensing—Objection to renewal of licence—Refusal of justices to renew—Appeal to quarter sessions—Jurisdiction to order non-appearing objector to pay costs—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49), s. 31, sub-sections 2, 5—Interpretation Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 63), s. 13, sub-section 11.

The licensee of a licensed house received notice of objection to the renewal of his licence, and the objector appeared at the annual licensing meeting and opposed the renewal. The licensing justices refused to renew the licence, and the licensee appealed to the court of quarter sessions, having served due notice of the appeal upon the objector. The objector took no part in the appeal, and did not appear before the court, which allowed the appeal and ordered the objector to pay the costs.

Held, that the court of quarter sessions had jurisdiction to order the objector to pay the costs, as he was a "party" to the appeal within section 31 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, although he had not appeared before the court.

Rule calling on the justices of Kent and others to show cause why a writ of certiorari should not issue to bring up and quash an order made by the East Kent Quarter Sessions, in so far as such order ordered a Mr. Boulter to pay the costs of an appeal, on the ground that the justices had no jurisdiction to make the order.

Mr. Boulter, at whose instance the present rule was obtained, had given a written notice of opposition—under section 42 of the Licensing Act, 1872—to the renewal of the licence of a certain licensed house in Dover, which had been licensed for many years. This notice was given on the 16th of August, 1895, and was served on Mr. Sharp, the licensee of the house, and stated that the objector intended at the general annual licensing meeting for the borough of Dover, to be held on the 26th of August, to oppose the renewal of the licence, on the ground that the licence was not needed for the requirements of the neighbourhood.

Mr. Boulter, the objector, appeared by his solicitor before the licensing justices at the Town Hall, Dover, on the 26th of August, and opposed the renewal of the licence. There was no other opposition except the opposition of the solicitor who appeared for the objector and the Temperance party. In consequence of the opposition the renewal of the licence was refused by the licensing justices.

The licensee and the lessees of the house appealed to the East Kent Quarter Sessions, and notices of the appeal were duly served upon the objector, Mr. Boulter, and upon the clerk of the justices.

The appeal was heard before the East Kent Quarter Sessions at Canterbury on the 15th of October, 1895, and neither the objector nor the licensing justices who had refused the licence appeared. The court allowed the appeal, and granted a renewal of the licence, and they also made an order that the objector, Mr. Boulter, who had not appeared before them, should pay the taxed costs of the appeal, which were afterwards taxed at £73.

Mr. Boulter objected to pay these costs upon the ground that, as he had not appeared before the court of quarter sessions to oppose the appeal, he was not a party to the appeal, and that therefore the court had no jurisdiction to make an order ordering him to pay the costs; and he then obtained the present rule to bring up and quash the order in so far as it ordered him to pay the costs of the appeal. The question now was whether the court of quarter sessions had jurisdiction to order the objector, who had not appeared before them, to pay costs.

The Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict c. 49), provides:—

Section 31: "Where any person is authorized to appeal from the conviction or order of a court of summary jurisdiction to a court of general or quarter sessions, he may appeal to such court, subject to the conditions and regulations following: (2) The appellant shall . . . give notice of appeal by serving on the other party and on the clerk of the said court of summary jurisdiction notice in writing of his intention to appeal, and of the general grounds of such appeal; (5) The court of appeal may adjourn the hearing of the appeal, and upon the hearing thereof may confirm, reverse, or modify the decision of the court of summary jurisdiction, . . . and may by such order exercise any power which the court of summary jurisdiction might have exercised, and such order shall have the same effect, and may be enforced in the same manner, as if it had been made by the court of summary jurisdiction. The court of appeal may also make such order as to costs to be paid by either party as the court may think just."

The Interpretation Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 63), provides:—

Section 13, sub-section 11: "The expression 'court of summary jurisdiction' shall mean any justice or justices of the peace, or other magistrate, by whatever name called, to whom jurisdiction is given by or who is authorized to act under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, whether in England, Wales, or Ireland, and whether acting under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts or any of them, or under any other Act, or by virtue of his commission, or under the common law."

Dickens, Q.C. (Lawson Walton, Q.C., and Bodkin with him), for the licensee, showed cause.—We concede that under the Alehouse Act, 1828 (9 Geo. 4, c. 61), the court would have had no jurisdiction in this case to grant costs. The important sections in that Act are sections 27 and 29. Under section 27 there was a right of appeal given to the quarter sessions, and under section 29 costs could be given either to or against the justices, and if costs were given against the justices then the justices were indemnified out of the county fund. Then section 42 of the Licensing Act, 1872, gave for the first time a right to any person to come in and object to the renewal of a licence, and whether the objector would or would not have been liable to costs before the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1884, since that time he is a "party" to the appeal within the meaning of section 31, sub-sections 2 and 5, of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879. By the definition of a "court of summary jurisdiction" given in section 7 of the Act of 1884, which is now repealed but replaced by section 13, subsection 11, of the Interpretation Act, 1889, it is clear that licensing justices acting in these matters are a court of summary jurisdiction. That being so, section 31 of the Act of 1879 applies, and the objector, whether he appeared in the court of quarter sessions or not, was a "party" whom the court could order to pay the costs. The case is really concluded by several authorities, such as Reg. v. The Justices of Glamorganshire, 40 W. R. 436, [1892] 1 Q. B. 621; Reg. v. The Licensing Justices of Bristol, 41 W. R. 379, 68 L. T. N. S. 225; Price v. James, 41 W. R. 57, [1892] 2 Q. B. 428; Reg. v. The Justices of London, 43 W. R. 387, [1895] 1 Q. B. 616; Reg. v. Purdey, 13 W. R. 75, 5 B. & S. 909. The objector therefore was the "other party" to the appeal within sub-sections 2 and 5 of the Act of 1879, and the court had jurisdiction to order him to pay the costs of the appeal, although he took no part in the appeal.

Asquith, Q.C. (Blaiklock with him), in support of the rule.—The right of appeal under the Licensing Acts remains as it was before the Act of 1884; it has neither been enlarged, diminished, nor modified. To come within section 31 of the Act of 1879, the party must be the party who is really litigating the appeal. "Either party" there means "either party who is litigating the appeal," which the objector here was not.

He then referred to the cases above cited.

Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—I think that this rule must be discharged. One cannot have listened to this argument without seeing that the question is one of very general importance, and that the whole of the law relating to this matter is in a most unsatisfactory condition. It is very far from clear, and is most confused. The question is one of very great importance, because the Licensing Act of 1872, for some good public purpose, does undoubtedly give power to anyone to come before the justices upon an application for the renewal of a licence, having first given notice stating the grounds of objection; or without any such notice at all the party may appear and object; and in the latter case where no preliminary notice has been given the court has power to adjourn, and may upon its own motion make such inquiry as it thinks right. It is quite clear that that salutary power may be made very limited if parties who think that they ought to object have before them the danger of possibly being visited with costs, or the danger of being committed to what may be a very expensive course of litigation, leading up by one course of procedure to the House of Lords. There lies outside this immediate question a very important question indicated during the argument, whether the class of authorities, of which Reg. v. The Justices of Glamorganshire is an example, is a true exposition of the law, or whether the procedure having relation to the Licensing Acts is to be treated for all purposes, and especially for the purposes in question here, as analogous to the ordinary case of litigation in some courts of summary jurisdiction, where there is a distinct informant or complainant, and a distinct person called on to answer the charge made in that information or complaint.

It is, however, enough for the purposes of this case to say that, in the face of the decision in Reg. v. The Justices of Glamorganshire, we must assume that the court in this case was acting under the powers conferred by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts. We must assume that that case was correctly decided; and the question then is shortly this: Whether or not the applicant for this rule was a "party" within the meaning of section 31 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879? The facts were these. [His lordship having stated the facts, proceeded:] Were the justices within their jurisdiction in making the order they made? That depends mainly upon the proper construction of section 31 of the Act of 1879. [His lordship read section 31, sub-sections 2 and 5.] Was the applicant in this case, the objector in the court below, a "party"? On the whole I think he was. A good deal might be said if this were open for us to consider as a matter of principle, even upon the minor point, and especially upon the foundation of some of the language used by the members of the court in the decision of Reg. v. The Justices of London; but I think there is express authority by which, sitting in this court, we must consider ourselves bound, and to which our decision must conform. I need not mention the authorities in detail, but they are Reg. v. The Justices of Bristol, where the superintendent of police having opposed in the court below, it was held that having done no more he was the "other party" within the meaning of sub-section 2; and to say that the same person who is the "other party" for the purpose of that sub-section is not also the "other party" within and for the purposes of sub-section 5 would be a very difficult thing. There is also the case of Price v. James, which, although not so decidedly in point, as it was the case of making a person a respondent on the statement of a special case, nevertheless is a decision in the same direction. Finally, there was the case of Reg. v. Purdey, which, although not under the Licensing Acts, is in point here. There the informant before the court below procured a decision or conviction from magistrates and did not appear on the appeal; but it was decided by the court—and on that decision we feel ourselves bound to act—that he was a party to the appeal, and so liable to costs.

Upon these short grounds, and within the very limited area in which I feel justified in exercising my own judgment, I think, in view of these decided cases, that this rule must be discharged.

WRIGHT, J.—I am of the same opinion. The applicant, Mr. Boulter, gave a notice which in fact had the effect of preventing the renewal of Sharp's licence, and that obliged Sharp to appeal. That being so, I cannot see that there is anything wrong or unjust in saying that Sharp ought to have his costs of that appeal if the quarter sessions had power to give them. Whether they had that power or not depends on whether the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, 1848 and 1879, have been applied to these licensing matters by the Interpretation Act, 1889; and, secondly, whether Boulter could be said to be a party to this appeal. I think we are bound on both points. Long before the case of Reg. v. The Justices of Glamorganshire was decided there was an authority which bound the court in that case, that the Summary Jurisdiction Act did apply to matters to which it was not previously supposed to apply. On the other point also we are bound by the case of Reg. v. The Justices of Bristol, that the objector before the licensing magistrates is, for some purposes at any rate, to be treated as an objector in relation to the appeal, and therefore a party in relation to the appeal.

(Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., and Wright, J.)

April 14.

REG. v. PAYNE AND COOPER. (a.)

Contempt of court—Pending criminal charge—Newspaper comments tending to prejudice trial.

On an application for a writ of attachment for contempt of court by the respondents in respect of certain newspaper articles, it appeared that the applicant had been arrested on a charge of arson and that the charge had been dismissed; that an article published in the paper while the applicant was under remand referred to the fact that he had been charged with arson and imputed dishonesty to him. The applicant was afterwards committed for trial for larceny and embezzlement, and the trial was still pending at the date of the application. While he was awaiting trial there were published in the paper an article alluding to the charges pending against the applicant and a report of the proceedings at a meeting of the standing joint committee of the county, at which the prosecution of the applicant was considered and ex parte statements made as to that prosecution.

Held, that none of the publications appeared to be intended or calculated to prejudice the pending trial of the applicant, and that no attachment ought to issue.

Principles regulating applications to commit for contempt of court considered.

Argument of an order nisi obtained on the 25th of March on behalf of Gower calling upon the respondents Payne and Cooper to show cause why a writ of attachment should not issue against them for contempt of court for writing, printing, and publishing in the Huntingdonshire Post of the 30th of November, 1895, and 15th of February, 1896, certain comments relating to the applicant, and in the same newspaper of the 7th of March, 1896, a report of the proceedings at a meeting of the Huntingdonshire Standing Joint Committee at which the question of confirming the action of the chief constable in obtaining legal assistance for the police in a case against the applicant was discussed, the applicant being at the time of the publication complained of under remand or committal for trial on charges of larceny and embezzlement.

The applicant was, up to the 22nd of November, 1895, sub-editor and manager of the Huntingdonshire Post, a newspaper published by the Huntingdonshire Post Co.

On the 28th of November the applicant was charged with attempting to set fire to the offices of the company, and was remanded to the 5th of December, when the charge was dismissed.

On the 30th of November an article written by Payne was published in the newspaper in which the charge of arson against the applicant was alluded to. It contained the following passages: "At all events a systematic suppression of all letters, an elaborate and unauthorized correspondence in his employer's name on his own behalf appears to be the only necessary step to be taken by a sufficiently skilful and dishonest person in a position of trust in such offices." "It was evident that they (the company) had been the victims of an elaborate and prolonged system of fraud."

The applicant was further charged with forgery, larceny, and embezzlement, and was committed for trial on those charges. At the assizes in January, 1896, the grand jury threw out the bill for forgery, but returned true bills for larceny and embezzlement. The trial was postponed to the summer assizes.

On the 15th of February the respondent Cooper, who had purchased the Huntingdonshire Post from the liquidator of the company, published in that paper an article containing the following passage "As our readers are aware, owing to most unfortunate occurrences, the company has been in liquidation, the cause of which has to some extent appeared in our columns, and further information on the subject will probably become public after the assizes to be held at Huntingdon in May. Meanwhile it is obviously our duty to make no further reference to the matter."

On the 7th of March, 1896, a report was published in the paper of the proceedings at a meeting of the Huntingdonshire Standing Joint Committee at which a resolution was passed confirming the action of the chief constable in obtaining legal assistance for the police in the prosecution pending against the applicant. The meetings of the committee were open to the public, and reports of the proceedings were commonly published in the local newspapers.

Shearman, for the respondent Payne, and Dickens, Q.C., and Brooke Little, for the respondent Cooper, showing cause against the order nisi, were stopped by the court.

Poyser, for the applicant, in support of the order.—These publications amount to a contempt of court; they are comments on pending proceedings, and are calculated to prejudice the fair trial of the applicant: Ex parte Crown Bank, In re O'Malley, 39 W. R. 45, 44 Ch. D. 649; Coats v. Chadwick, 42 W. R. 328, [1894] 1 Ch. 347.

Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—In this case an order has been obtained calling upon the respondents to show cause why they should not be committed for contempt of court in printing and publishing certain articles referring to the applicant, a person who is awaiting his trial for larceny and embezzlement, which articles he contends are calculated to prejudice his case in the eyes of the jury who are to try him. In my opinion the application is unfounded, and the order ought to be discharged with costs; but I wish to express the view which I entertain that applications of this kind have, in many cases, gone too far. The power which the court possesses in such cases is no doubt a salutary power, and it ought to be exercised in cases where there is a real contempt, but only where there are serious grounds for its exercise. It is not every libel upon a person awaiting his trial which is a contempt of court; the applicant must show that what has been published is clearly intended, or at least is calculated, to prejudice the pending trial. In the present case the applicant was on the 28th of November last charged with attempted arson, and on the 30th of November the first article complained of appeared. In my opinion that article is no more than a reasonable explanation for the information of the shareholders and other persons interested in the company to whom the newspaper then belonged. The article states facts which certainly imply that the applicant was charged with arson, and he was in fact so charged at that time; on the 5th of December that charge was dismissed, so that at the date when the application for this order was made there was no charge of arson pending against the applicant. As to the articles of the 15th of February and the 7th of March, 1896, I think that they contain perfectly innocuous statements. The last article is merely a fair report of the proceedings of a public body. No doubt statements of an ex parte character were made in the course of those proceedings, but it is ridiculous to assert that the publication of those statements would prejudice the pending trial. I will not refer to the decisions in the Chancery Division which have been cited, further than to say that in my opinion in some instances the courts have gone rather too far.

In Hunt v. Clarke, 37 W. R. 724, an application to commit was refused by Mathew and Grantham, JJ., and the Court of Appeal affirmed their decision. Cotton, L.J., in his judgment, after referring to several cases, and in particular to In re Clements, Republic of Costa Rica v. Erlanger, 46 L. J. Ch. 375 (before Jessel, M.R.), says: "Now that I apply and adopt as the principle which ought to regulate these applications—that there should be no such application made unless the thing done is of such a nature as to require the arbitrary and summary interference of the court in order to enable justice to be duly and properly administered without any interruption or interference. That is what we have to consider; and in my opinion although, as I say, there is here that which is technically a contempt, and may be such a contempt as to be of a serious nature, I cannot think there is any such interference or any such fear of any such interference with the due conduct of this action, or any such prejudice to the defendant who is applying here, as to justify the court in interfering by this summary and arbitrary process. When it is clear and evident on the facts of the case and on the documents . . . that such is the case in my opinion no such application ought to be made." I wish to adopt the view of the law stated by Cotton, L.J., in that judgment.

For these reasons I think that this order nisi ought to be discharged with costs.

WRIGHT, J.—I agree with all that the Lord Chief Justice has said, and I will only add that, in my opinion, in order to justify an application to commit, the publication must be calculated really to interfere with a fair trial, and if this is not the case the question does not arise whether the publication is so objectionable in its terms as to call for the interference of the court. If the publication is found to be likely to interfere with a fair trial, a second question arises whether, in the circumstances, the jurisdiction which the court in that case possesses ought to be exercised, not so much for punishment as with the object of preventing the repetition of similar conduct. That is the rule which I wish to adopt as to applications of this nature.

Gas company—Supply of gas—Breach of statutory duty—Remedy—Right of action—Gasworks Clauses Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 41), ss. 11, 12, 36.

Where a gas company to whom the provisions of the Gasworks Clauses Act, 1871, apply cause damage to a consumer by reason of their failure to supply to him gas sufficient in quantity and quality to satisfy the requirements of the Act, an action will not lie by the consumer against the company in respect of such damage. The only remedy for breach of the statutory obligation of the company is by proceedings for penalties under section 36 of the Act.

Appeal of the plaintiffs from the County Court of Yorkshire holden at Skipton.

The action was brought to recover £50 damages from the defendants for breach of a contract to supply gas continuously as required by the plaintiffs, and in accordance with the Earby and Thornton Gas Order, 1894, under which order (and the Act 57 & 58 Vict. c. cxvi. confirming it) the defendants supplied gas within the prescribed limits. In the alternative the plaintiffs claimed damages for breach of the defendant's statutory duties under the gas order and confirming Act, and under the Gasworks Clauses Act.

The plaintiffs had paid for a supply of gas by the defendants, but there was no express contract between them. They adduced evidence to show that on certain days no gas had been supplied, and that on other days the supply of gas had been deficient and impure and at less than the prescribed pressure.

The Gasworks Clauses Act, 1871, which was incorporated in the gas order, provides (section 11) that "the undertakers shall, upon being required so to do by the owner or occupier of any premises, . . . give, and continue to give, a supply of gas for such premises under such pressure in the main as may be prescribed." Section 12 requires that the quality and purity of the gas shall be such as to satisfy certain tests. Section 36 imposes certain penalties upon the undertakers if they neglect or refuse to supply gas under less than the prescribed pressure, or of less illuminating power, or of less purity than it ought to be according to the provisions of the Act.

The county court judge found that the plaintiffs had sustained damage to the amount of £50 by reason of the supply of gas having been insufficient and impure; but he gave judgment for the defendants, on the ground that the action was not maintainable.

The plaintiffs appealed.

R. M. Bray (T. T. Paine with him), for the plaintiffs.—The action will lie. The defendants are under a statutory obligation to supply sufficient gas of the quality prescribed by the Gasworks Clauses Act, 1871, and at the proper pressure. Where they are paid by a person for a supply of gas their obligation is the same as if it arose from express contract, and if the supply to that person is insufficient or impure they are liable in damages if he suffers thereby. The penalties imposed by section 36 are no sufficient remedy. The case of Atkinson v. Newcastle Waterworks Co., 25 W. R. 794, 2 Ex. D. 441, is distinguishable, for there the breach was of a public duty to supply water to the public: here there is a duty to the individual, for which payment is made; nor are Hoddesdon Gas Co. v. Haselwood, 7 W. R. 415, 6 C. B. N. S. 239, or Milnes v. Mayor of Huddersfield, 34 W. R. 761, 11 App. Cas. 511, in point. Where there is a breach of a statutory duty causing loss to an individual an action lies: Couch v. Steel, 2 W. R. 170, 3 E. & B. 402.

C. A. Russell, for the defendants.—There was no contract between the plaintiffs and the defendants. The statute provides penalties for breaches of the statutory duties of gas companies, and this is the only method of enforcing the performance of those duties. There is no right of action on the part of individual consumers.

R. M. Bray replied.

WILLS, J.—This is a question of importance, but I feel no difficulty in deciding it. The question is as to the remedy in a case where a gas company fails to supply gas according to the statutes under which it acts. These statutes have been in force for many years, and no case is to be found of an action of this kind which has succeeded. The principle which governs this case is that where a duty created by statute affects the public as the public, the remedy for a breach of the duty is to indict or to take the proceedings authorized by the statute itself. If any individual could bring an action of this kind, the undertakers might very speedily be ruined. I think therefore that on this principle this action cannot be maintained. This is not the same case as Atkinson v. Newcastle Waterworks Co. or Milnes v. Mayor of Huddersfield; but I think the principle which is applicable here is deeper than that on which those cases were decided—that is, that where a statute creates an obligation to do something for the benefit of the public generally or of a body of persons so large that they can only be dealt with en masse, and the failure to fulfil the obligation is liable to injure all those persons in like manner (though in a greater or less degree), there is no separate right of action to each person injured. Often a specific remedy is provided by the statute, as in the present case, but not always; for instance, there is no specific remedy for the failure of an urban authority to perform their duty of providing an efficient system of sewerage. Yet no action will lie on the part of individual members of the public who suffer from the breach of that obligation. The appeal must be dismissed.

WRIGHT, J.—I am of the same opinion. The obligation of the defendants depends upon statute, not upon contract. The general rule is that when an obligation is created by statute and a remedy for breach of it is provided the statutory remedy is the only remedy. That is laid down in Doe v. Bridges, 1 B. & Ad. 847, 859; Stevens v. Jeacocke, 11 Q. B. 731; Marshall v. Nicholls, 18 Q. B. 882; and other cases. That principle applies here. In this case I am not sure that there is an absolute obligation to supply gas at all; there is clearly no contractual obligation. And I doubt whether an action for a nuisance would lie in such a case as this, for it is the plaintiffs who have brought the gas upon their own premises.

Appeal dismissed; leave to appeal granted.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 2.—The judgment of the court (Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J., POLLOCK, B., and HAWKINS, CAVE, and WILLS, JJ.) was delivered by Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—The defendant was charged with certain misdemeanours under the Debtors Act, 1869. On the 20th of May, 1895, he had been duly adjudicated bankrupt, and, under the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 17, he had been duly examined on oath on five different days, and on the last of those days, namely, the 19th of November, 1895, the examination was adjourned sine die. During his examination a shorthand writer had taken down in shorthand the evidence of the defendant and made a transcript of it, but the transcript was not read over to or by or signed by the defendant. At the trial parol evidence of the shorthand writer was tendered and received of statements or admissions made by the defendant in the course of his examination of facts tending to establish the misdemeanours with which he was charged. The question is, Was that parol evidence properly admitted?

It was argued that it was improperly admitted, first, on the ground that the examination, having been adjourned sine die, was not completed, and therefore the defendant might not have had the opportunity of making a complete statement and explanation. As to this it is to be observed that the deputy recorder has, in the case before us, found as a fact that no incomplete statement was given in evidence, by which I understand him to mean that the statements of which evidence was given were not fragmentary, but were, so far as the particular facts dealt with by them, complete. This is not, however, I apprehend, the character of the objection in fact urged. That objection I understand to be that, even if otherwise admissible, the parol evidence of the statements made was not admissible because the examination was adjourned sine die, and was not in that sense complete. In my judgment, whichever form the objection takes, it is one which goes only to the effect and weight of the evidence, and not to its admissibility. If the jury thought that the statements were fragmentary or incomplete, it would properly affect the weight they would think it just to attribute to them, but their admissibility would not be thereby affected.

The second and main objection urged is that upon the true construction of the 17th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, the only evidence which can be received of the statements made by the bankrupt is the transcript taken down in writing and read over to and signed by the debtor under that Act, or read over by the debtor and signed by him under the later Act of 1890. A further objection urged was that any such transcript, even if read over and signed, would not be admissible in a criminal prosecution, and that, a fortiori, parol evidence of statements made during examination was not admissible in such a prosecution. In support of these objections the lawfully detained as a lunatic, though she has not been so found, and in one sense she is lawfully detained—that is to say, the law of Belgium has been complied with.

A difficulty has, however, arisen which was suggested by the officers of the Lunacy Department—namely, that the expression "lawfully detained" in the section which I have read means lawfully detained under the powers of this Act of Parliament.

I have had an opportunity of looking through the whole of the Lunacy Act, 1890, and I have come to the conclusion (reluctantly, I must confess) that the view taken by the master is right, and that by the expression "lawfully detained" is meant lawfully detained under that Act. The law about detention is to be found in Part I. of the Act, and it is impossible to read sections 4 and 9 and those which relate to reception orders without seeing that "lawfully detained" means lawfully detained under the Act. Then sections 85 and 86, and the clauses relating to visitation and to actions for unlawful detention, all lead to the same view. Therefore upon the true construction of the whole Act we are, I think, bound to come to the conclusion that we cannot make this order at this time. There are two ways of getting out of the difficulty—namely, that the lady be found a lunatic by inquisition although she is out of the jurisdiction, or she may be brought within the jurisdiction. If it is likely that she can be brought into this country, this application had better stand over.

LOPES, L.J.—I have come to the same conclusion as that which has just been expressed by my lord. I am of opinion that "lawfully detained" means lawfully detained under the provisions of this Act, that is to say, lawfully detained within the jurisdiction.

There may be a certain amount of inconvenience about it, but I am reconciled to that by the fact that there are the ways of overcoming the difficulty which Lindley, L.J., has pointed out, and I am unable to resist the conclusion that the meaning of "lawfully detained" is that which I have stated.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and have nothing to add to what has been said.

Appeal from Stirling, J.

In November, 1895, Messrs. Stuart & Olivant contracted with Mr. Charles Seadon for the sale to him, at the price of £195, of certain leasehold property of which the vendors were mortgagees. The root of the vendors' title was an underlease of the 13th of October, 1865. The conditions of sale contained nothing to show that this underlease was not in the vendors' possession, or that it would not be produced to the purchaser and handed over to him on completion; but on the investigation of title it appeared that the underlease comprised other property besides that agreed to be sold to the purchaser, and that the vendors had only an attested copy of the deed, and did not even know where the original was. The vendors' solicitor offered to make, at the purchaser's expense, further searches with the view of finding in whose possession the original was, insisting that the case was governed by section 3, sub-section 6, of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, which throws upon the purchaser "the expenses of searching for, procuring, making, verifying, and producing all certificates, declarations, evidences, and information not in the vendor's possession." The purchaser then took out a vendor and purchaser summons, claiming a declaration that by reason of the vendors' refusal to furnish the purchaser, save at his own expense, with information as to the whereabouts of the underlease, a good title had not been shown. Stirling, J., on the 10th of March, 1896, decided that the purchaser was not entitled to the declaration he claimed, and the purchaser appealed.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Stewart Smith, for the appellant.—Section 3, sub-section 6, of the Conveyancing Act was intended to draw a distinction between collateral matters of evidence, as to which it throws the expenses on the purchaser, and matters relating to the title itself.

They cited In re Johnson & Tustin, 33 W. R. 737, 30 Ch. D. 42; Moody to Yates, 33 W. R. 785, 30 Ch. D. 344; In re Willett & Argenti, W. N. 1889, p. 66, 60 L. T. N. Elgood, for the respondents, was not called upon.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I do not think we can take a different view of the construction of the Act from that which has been taken by Stirling, J. One cannot but bear in mind that there was a time when, owing to the requisitions of purchasers, very heavy and unnecessary expenses were thrown upon vendors. The object of section 3, sub-section 6, of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, was to check that abuse. Whether in doing that the Legislature has not gone a little too far, and imposed too onerous terms on a purchaser, is another matter. I rather think they have; but what we have to do is to construe the Act. What strikes one on reading the sub-section is, in the first place, that it deals only with expenses. It has nothing whatever to do with the duty of making out titles or of procuring deeds. Accordingly, it was held by the Court of Appeal in In re Johnson & Tustin that the vendor is bound to supply a proper abstract, and must pay the expense of procuring any deed which is necessary for that purpose; and in Moody to Yates, that the vendor must complete his title by producing any document which is essential to show that he has a title. Those were questions of title; but we have here to do with that to which the sub-section is addressed, expenses of obtaining information. Well now, for the life of me I cannot get out of the language of this section. The section appears to me to have thrown this particular expense on the purchaser, in language too plain to be escaped from. To give effect to the very ingenious argument of Mr. Swinfen Eady and Mr. Stewart Smith would be to cut down the language of the Act to an unjustifiable extent. I think the case is a hard one, but I cannot help it. I think Stirling, J., was quite right, and that the appeal must be dismissed.

Lopes, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I must say that if I thought it at all possible I should very much like to relieve the purchaser of the expenses which have been cast upon him. In a case like this it is to be observed that this section has nothing to do with production of documents, as to which it leaves the vendor's duty unchanged. It does not relieve him of the duty to produce, it only treats of expenses. I suppose the object of this section must have been to relieve vendors from vexatious requisitions; and I venture to think that the Legislature has wandered further than was requisite, and that mischief has been done on that account, because I cannot help thinking that in a case like this the vendor ought to protect himself by conditions. It seems to me that as the matter stands the best thing for a vendor would be always to sell under an open contract, and to cast on the purchaser the expense of finding any of the title deeds which are not in the vendor's possession. That expense, I think, as a matter of justice, the purchaser ought not to bear. But there is the Act of Parliament. No doubt it has materially altered the old law; because that is very well stated in Sugden on Vendors and Purchasers, 8th ed., at p. 387. But I again say there is the Act of Parliament, which, being read, appears to me to cover a case like this. I do not feel that I can give effect to the ingenious argument addressed to us. I think Stirling, J., has taken the right view of that section, and that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

Kay, L.J., after stating the facts, proceeded:—Before the Conveyancing Act there would not have been a question about it. The vendors would have been bound to get the information at their own expense, because it was information necessary to enable the purchaser to verify the abstract of title; and before the sale was completed, and whether it was completed or not, the vendor was bound to give the purchaser every facility of that kind, and if there was expense in doing so to pay the expense. No doubt it happened very often that useless requisitions were made which exposed the vendors to expense, and that Act, in this part of it, was passed for the purpose of checking that abuse and throwing the expense of obtaining information on the purchaser. In this case it seems to me an uncommonly hard thing. The purchaser says: "The underlease is the very root of the title which you abstracted. For anything I know it may be in the possession of a mortgagee, and I want to know where it is." The vendors say: "We don't know where it is; but if we find it for you, you must pay the expense." The question is whether under this Act there is any possibility of escaping from the conclusion which the learned judge has arrived at. [The Lord Justice stated the provisions of the sub-section, and proceeded:—] That word "information" is as large as it can be; but it is tried to limit it by the words associated with it, and it is argued that the words "certificates, declarations, and evidences" limit the general meaning of the word "information," and make it mean something like certificates, declarations, and evidences. But it is obvious that it cannot be so, because a certificate, for instance, is not information. Take the ordinary case of a certificate of birth, death, or marriage. So "declarations," which is intended, I suppose, to mean statutory declarations of some fact in the title. That is not information. The language is not "certificates, declarations, evidences, or any other information," nor indeed is it even "certificates, declarations, evidences, or information." It is "and information." Information means something different, essentially different, from certificates, declarations, or evidence. Therefore you may leave out those words, for the association does not limit the meaning of the word information, and it will read, "the expenses of searching for and procuring all information." I would escape from the words if I could, because I think they do in this case produce considerable hardship. A vendor might not have any of the deeds in his possession. All the deeds in a long chain of title might be out of his possession, and he might be ignorant where every one of them was. He need not make any condition throwing the expense of obtaining them on the purchaser; but when the purchaser asks for them he might safely answer: "I don't know. If you want the information, I will get it for you, at your expense." If the Legislature had carefully considered what they were doing, I think they would not have made the section quite so wide; but I cannot possibly construe the words so as not to apply to the case before us—a case in which the purchaser wants information where the deed the root of title is, and the vendor says: "Yes, I will get it for you, but you must pay for it."

Company—Winding up—Mortgage of charges payable quarterly—Mortgage principal and interest in arrear—Proof by mortgagee as unsecured creditor for sum in arrear.

A company mortgaged certain charges entitling the mortgagors to receive certain quarterly payments, and covenanted to pay to the mortgagees on the same quarter days, in discharge of principal and interest under the mortgage, sums equal to those payments; the understanding being that so long as the instalments were regularly paid to the mortgagees the mortgagors should continue to receive the payments under the charges. The payments due under the mortgage having fallen into arrear, and the mortgagors being in course of being wound up,

Held, that the mortgagee was entitled to keep the mortgage as a security for future payments payable thereunder, and to prove in the winding up, as for money had and received, for any payments received by the mortgagors in respect of the mortgaged property after the instalments due under the mortgage ceased to be paid.

Appeal from Vaughan Williams, J.

By a deed dated the 14th of May, 1886, the Lands Securities Co. mortgaged to the Norwich Union Life Insurance Society, to secure a sum of £38,381 11s. 9d. and interest thereon, certain charges executed by the Enclosure Commissioners for England under the Limited Owners' Residence Acts, 1870 and 1871, and the Improvement of Land Act, 1864; and by another deed of even date, made between the same parties, to secure the sum of £10,636 15s. 9d. and interest, mortgaged certain rate loan charges created under the Mortgage Debenture Act, 1865. The principal sums secured by the mortgages were repayable by quarterly instalments, so arranged that as each quarterly payment of the charges comprised in the mortgages became payable to the mortgagors a like sum became payable by the mortgagors to the mortgagees. In April, 1894, the company went into voluntary liquidation, and in May, 1894, the liquidation was ordered to be continued subject to the supervision of the court. At Lady Day, 1894, the company had received in respect of the charges already mentioned sums amounting to £839 9s. 7d. All previous instalments of the mortgage money and interest had been duly paid, but nothing was paid to the Norwich Union in respect of the principal and interest due at Lady Day, 1894. The Norwich Union, as mortgagees, afterwards entered into receipt of the charges comprised in the mortgages, and claimed to be entitled to retain the mortgages as security for future payments thereunder, and to prove as unsecured creditors for the sum in arrear. The liquidator having rejected the claim, the Norwich Union took out a summons asking for a declaration that they were entitled in accordance with their claim. Vaughan Williams, J., made the declaration, and the liquidator appealed.

A. R. Kirby, for the appellant.

Henry Terrell, for the respondent Society, was not called upon.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I think the order made by the learned judge is quite right. This is a very unusual case, in fact I do not know that I have ever seen one exactly like it before. The difficulty arises from the nature of the property mortgaged, and from the arrangement made for securing the advance. The sum of £839 9s. 7d. is not the rents of the mortgaged property. It is the actual property which forms the mortgage security. Apart from bankruptcy or winding up, what is the position of the mortgagees? If the mortgagors are paying the instalments regularly, there is an implied understanding that the mortgagors shall continue to receive the money as before. But the money does not become the property of the mortgagors, except subject to the condition that they shall pay the sum that becomes due to the mortgagees. I do not think this mortgage would work if it were not so. I agree that if all works smoothly the mortgagees cannot claim anything in respect of those receipts, and that, I think, is quite intelligible. But if the instalments are not paid, I cannot conceive what answer there could be to an action by the mortgagees for money had and received. But that is complicated by the winding up of the company, the mortgagors, who rely upon the well-known rule that a secured creditor must elect between his right of proof and his security, he cannot both retain his security and prove for his debt. But that is not what the Norwich Union claim to do. They say, "You have got part of our security, give it up to us." That is their claim, and I do not see any answer to it.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

KAY, L.J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. It seems to me that the argument for the appellants is based on a confusion between this case and the case of a claim by a mortgagee for back rents. It is in fact a claim for the actual subject of the security, those rents and charges which become due quarterly, and which the mortgagor receives, and is to be allowed to receive so long as he pays the instalments. If he does not pay these, the mortgagee can at once say to him, "Hand me over that which is my property"; and if he can follow it in specie he is entitled to get it in specie, because it is exactly that which the mortgagor has assigned to him in security for the debt. As he cannot follow the actual coins received by the mortgagor, the only remedy is to say to the mortgagor, "You have received part of my security, and I claim to prove for that." The proof is not a proof under a covenant in the mortgage; that is exactly what the mortgagee is not trying to do. He is trying to realize that part of his security which is the only part he can realize at present. I agree that where the mortgagor has kept down the instalments, then the rent-charges which he has received up to that time could not be recovered from him by the mortgagee. That is not explicitly stated in the mortgage, but the whole arrangement seems to involve an understanding that if the mortgagor does pay regularly the mortgagee shall not recover from him the rent-charges which have become due up to that time. I think the learned judge below was quite right.

Appeal dismissed.

LIQUIDATION ESTATES PURCHASE CO. (LIMITED) v. WILLOUGHBY. (a.)

Mortgage—Purchase of mortgaged property—Payment off by purchaser of incumbrance—Intention to keep alive incumbrance—Presumption.

Where a purchaser of a property pays off a mortgage on it without showing an intention to keep it alive, still, if its continuance as an existing charge is beneficial to him, it will be treated in equity as subsisting unless an intention to the contrary can be inferred from the terms of the purchase deed or from other legitimate evidence. But the opportunity of making a very doubtful claim against third parties is not such a benefit as is meant in this enunciation of the doctrine. Further, if an intention to keep alive a charge on property is inconsistent with the real intention of the parties to the deed by which the property was assigned to the purchaser, the charge cannot be treated as still subsisting simply because the purchaser afterwards finds it would have been better for him to have kept the charge alive.

So held, by Lindley and A. L. Smith, L.JJ. (Kay, L.J., dissenting), affirming the decision of North, J. Toulmin v. Steere, 3 Mer. 210, questioned.

Appeal from a decision of North, J.

The facts of the case, as stated in the written judgment of Kay, L.J., were as follow.

On the 20th of June, 1888, E. J. Walker, having contracted to purchase a business for £502,000, agreed with the defendant Willoughby, Lord Henry Paulet, and Kennedy to borrow from them respectively £10,000, £9,000, and £6,000, for which he gave them a charge upon all his interest, present and future, in his contract. For these loans the lenders were to receive a bonus equal to their respective advances.

In January, 1889, Walker sold the business to a joint-stock company for £850,000.

(a.) Reported by W. SHALLCROSS GODDARD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Kennedy's claim against Walker was £12,000. On the 21st of September, 1888, Kennedy mortgaged his interest to Norton for £6,200. Notice of this charge was at once given to Walker. In April, 1889, £5,122 was paid by Walker's direction to Kennedy, and in June, 1890, property worth £5,000 was in like manner transferred to Kennedy, thus reducing his claim against Walker to £1,878. In the meantime Kennedy had mortgaged his equity of redemption to Lord Windsor, and in December, 1890, this mortgage was transferred to Forrest as his trustee. This was confirmed by Kennedy in 1891.

On the 17th of March, 1893, a deed was executed whereby, after reciting the above-stated facts and that Lord Windsor had agreed to sell to the Capital Finance Co. for £6,000 (inter alia), "all the interest of the said Lord Windsor, or of the said John Norton, of and in the premises comprised in and charged by the said instrument of 20th June, 1888," and that Norton concurred on the terms that he should receive £1,000 out of the £6,000 "as the consideration for the sale and assignment of" his "rights, benefits, and interest," and reciting that the Capital Co. had paid to Lord Windsor £4,000, and that the Liquidation Co., who were plaintiffs in this action, would pay the balance of the £6,000, it was witnessed that Norton, "at the request of Lord Windsor, and in respect of his rights, powers, benefits, and interests under the said agreement of the 21st of September, 1888," assigned, and Lord Windsor and Forrest as his trustee assigned, and the Capital Co. released and confirmed to the plaintiff company, all their "estate and interest of and in the interest formerly of Kennedy in or under the agreement of the 20th of June, 1888, and the moneys and bonuses thereby secured" absolutely. Then followed a provision that if Norton or Lord Windsor had a power of sale, such power should be exercised by that deed.

Lord Windsor had a power of sale, and the deed accordingly took effect as an exercise of the power so far as he was concerned. But Norton had no such power, and the question was whether this deed operated as a transfer of his mortgage or only as a release of his interest in the fund charged.

In June, 1889, Willoughby brought an action against Lord Henry Paulet, Kennedy, Walker, and others to realize his security. Norton was not made a party to that action. In January, 1891, a decree was made for an account of what was due to the three mortgagees, Lord Henry Paulet, Willoughby, and Kennedy, and of their respective receipts.

In that action a considerable sum, part of the fund mortgaged by Walker, was paid into court, and was still there. By order of the court that sum was to be applied in paying Lord Henry Paulet and Willoughby, so as to make them equal to Kennedy, before anything more was paid in respect of Kennedy's share, and this the fund was barely sufficient to do, so that no part would go to those who represented Kennedy.

The plaintiffs in their present action claimed to stand in the shoes of Norton, and to share rateably in that fund. Two answers were given to their claim: first, it was denied that the present plaintiffs had any transfer of Norton's mortgage; and secondly, it was urged that the payments to Kennedy were with Norton's sanction, and were consequently good against the plaintiffs as assigns from him.

The question was whether Norton's mortgage was to be treated as subsisting for the benefit of the plaintiffs as his assigns, or whether that mortgage was merged and extinguished by the deed of the 17th of March, 1893.

North, J., held that the mortgage could not be treated as subsisting for the benefit of the plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 26.—LINDLEY, L.J., read a judgment, in which A. L. SMITH, L.J., concurred. After stating the facts, his lordship continued as follows:—There is no doubt that the deed of the 17th of March, 1893, was intended to transfer and did transfer to the plaintiffs all Norton's interest in the security of June, 1888. But the question is whether the interest so transferred was transferred in order to be extinguished, so that the plaintiffs might obtain Kennedy's interest in the security of June, 1888, free from incumbrances; or whether Norton's interest was so transferred as to enable the plaintiffs to treat that interest as still subsisting, so as to confer upon them rights against third parties which Lord Windsor and Forrest could not confer. The answer to this question depends upon the intention of the parties at the time, and that intention must be found from the terms of the deed and the circumstances under which it was executed. The fact that Norton assigned his interest, and that the Capital and Finance Co. released theirs, is relied upon by the plaintiffs as showing that Norton's assignment was not intended to operate as a release; but the interests of Norton and of the Capital and Finance Co. were of such different characters that the use of different operative words to dispose of them is easily accounted for. Moreover, Norton assigned as mortgagee, and it seems to have been thought that he had or might have had a power of sale. Under those circumstances I cannot think the argument based on the above-mentioned difference of language in the operative words at all conclusive. We must look further and see what the real object of the parties was. The law upon this subject was laid down by the late Master of the Rolls in Adams v. Angell, 25 W. R. 139, 5 Ch. D. 634, as follows: "If a charge is paid off by a tenant for life, without any expression of his intention, it is well established that he retains the benefit of it against the inheritance. Although he has not declared his intention of keeping it alive, it is presumed that his intention was to keep it alive, because it is manifestly for his benefit. On the other hand, when the owner of an estate in fee or in tail pays off a charge, the presumption is the other way; but in either case the person paying off the charge can, by expressly declaring his intention, either keep it alive or destroy it. If there is no reason for keeping it alive, then, especially in the case of an owner in fee, equity will, in the absence of any declaration of his intention, destroy it; but if there is any reason for keeping it alive, such as the existence of another incumbrance, equity will not destroy it. So, in the case of a purchase, there is no doubt that the purchaser who pays off a charge, though merely equitable, may have it assigned to a trustee for himself, and it will protect him against mesne incumbrances if there are any. So also it is admitted that if, without going through the ceremony of the assignment of an equitable charge—an assignment which really passes nothing—a declaration is inserted in the deed that the charge shall be treated as remaining on foot for the purpose of protecting the purchaser against mesne incumbrances, then the charge is treated as remaining on foot, and protects him. The intention, therefore, if expressed, governs the case; but if no intention is expressed, then Toulmin v. Steere, 3 Mer. 210, says that the incumbrance which is paid off is merged, and the subsequent incumbrancers let in." According to this statement, a purchaser who pays off a charge must show an intention to keep it alive if he wishes to prevent its merger. Such an intention was shown in that case and also in Thorne v. Cann. Having regard to this decision, it is perhaps now safe to go a little further, and to say that where a purchaser of a property pays off a charge on it without showing an intention to keep it alive, still, if its continuance as an existing charge is beneficial to him, it will be treated in equity as subsisting, unless an intention to the contrary can be inferred from the terms of the purchase deed or from other legitimate evidence. I do not, however, think that the opportunity of making a very doubtful claim against third parties is such a benefit as is meant in such an enunciation of the doctrine under consideration. I am not aware of any case which shows that it is. But, further, I take it to be clear that if an intention to keep alive a charge on property is inconsistent with the real intention of the parties to the deed by which the purchaser of the property takes an assignment of it, such charge cannot be treated as still subsisting simply because the purchaser afterwards finds that it would have been better for him to have kept the charge alive. That, in my opinion, is the case here. The speculative character of Norton's claim against the other lenders, the absence of all allusion to the existence of any such claim, the absence of any assignment of his debt, the ignorance we are in even now of the amount due to him (for it is admitted that £6,200 is not), the recital of the agreement with Lord Windsor, and, lastly, the unusual clauses which follow the habendum, lead me to the conclusion that it was intended to extinguish Norton's claim, and not to keep it alive except in the event of the plaintiffs failing to obtain a good title under a valid power of sale. In that event no doubt, as Kennedy would have a right to redeem, both Norton's and Lord Windsor's charges would have to be treated as subsisting. What the plaintiffs, however, wanted was to purchase Kennedy's interest free from incumbrances under a power of sale. The recitals show that the real transaction was a sale by Lord Windsor under his power, but £1,000 of the purchase money was to be paid to Norton to get rid of his claim. The plaintiffs have got exactly what they expected and what they intended to buy, and they are not entitled now to treat Norton's charge as a subsisting charge. If, indeed, there were some unknown mesne incumbrancer who would be let in as a first incumbrancer if Norton's charge were not treated as subsisting, it may be that, notwithstanding Toulmin v. Steere, it could be so treated. But why? Because in that case the purchaser would not have got what he bargained for—namely, the property free from incumbrances, and it would be manifestly unjust to allow a third party to avail himself of the terms of a deed to which he is a stranger, in order to defeat the real intentions of the parties to it. It is on this ground that the courts have gone a long way, and very properly, to prevent a second or third incumbrancer from obtaining a priority by a mere accident, and at the expense of other people who never intended to benefit him—see, for example, Phillips v. Gutteridge, 4 De G. & J. 531, and Anderson v. Pignet, 21 W. R. 150, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 180.

This, however, is not a case in which the charge is wanted for any such purpose, and to treat Norton's charge as still subsisting under the circumstances of this case would be to stretch the equitable doctrines to which I have alluded much too far.

I am of opinion that the decision appealed from is correct, and that the appeal therefore ought to be dismissed with costs.

KAY, L.J., after stating the facts as above set out, continued as follows:—I was struck at first with the second defence; but there is no evidence that Norton sanctioned or knew of these payments. Norton was in court at the trial of this action, but was not called as a witness by either side. The plaintiffs alleged in their pleadings that Norton had sanctioned these payments, and at first it seemed to me that they ought to prove this allegation; but on consideration I am of opinion that the burthen of this proof was entirely on the defendants. The case must therefore be dealt with as though Norton was ignorant of the payments made by Walker to Kennedy, and must depend upon the decision of the first of the two points I have mentioned—namely, Is Norton's mortgage to be treated as subsisting for the benefit of the plaintiffs as his assigns? Or was that mortgage merged and extinguished by the deed of 1893?

No express intention to keep the mortgage alive appears on the face of the instrument. The debt due to Norton is not in terms assigned, as in the case of an ordinary transfer. But Norton does not, like the Capital Co., release his debt. On the contrary, he assigns, in the largest terms, all his "rights, powers, benefits, and interests." This does seem inconsistent with an intention to release and merge his charge. If that were all that was intended, a simple release would have been sufficient. Norton would hardly have assigned his "rights, powers, benefits, and interests" unless the parties intended the plaintiffs to have the use and advantage of these.

In many cases where no actual intention to keep a mortgage debt on foot could be discovered, the Court of Chancery has refused to treat it as merged where its existence was necessary for the protection of a bonâ fide purchaser. In Toulmin v. Steere the purchaser of an estate paid off two mortgages with part of the purchase money, and the owner of those mortgages joined in the conveyance. There was an incumbrance, subsequent to one of those mortgages but prior to the other, of which the purchaser had constructive notice. There was no evidence of an intention by the purchaser to keep the first mortgage alive, and Sir W. Grant (the Master of the Rolls) held that it was merged for the benefit of the unpaid incumbrancer.

This case has been much criticized, and I do not think would be so decided if the question arose now for the first time.

Take, for example, Phillips v. Gutteridge. Two mortgagees and the executor of the mortgagor joined in a mortgage for £1,200, part of which, the deed stated, was to be applied in paying off £400 due on one mortgage, and £300 due on the the other. The mortgage debts were not assigned. The mortgagees assigned, and the executor assigned and confirmed to the new mortgagee the property which was leasehold and all their respective estates and interests therein. There was no intention to keep the mortgage alive expressed, and the form of the deed was rather against such intention. But though Knight-Bruce, L.J., in his judgment, said that the deed was so constructed as to render it possible that the payment to the original mortgagees extinguished the mortgage debts, the intention to preserve the priority of those debts over charges created by the will of the mortgagor was indubitable. This conclusion was obviously nothing but a presumed intention from the fact that the existence of those mortgages was important to protect the new mortgagee against the charges created by the will.

In Adams v. Angell the Master of the Rolls (Sir George Jessel) said that where the owner of an estate in fee or tail pays off a charge the presumption is that he does not mean to keep it alive, but by expressly declaring his intention he may either keep it alive or destroy it. "If there is no reason for keeping it alive, then, especially in the case of an owner in fee, equity will, in the absence of any declaration of his intention, destroy it. But if there is any reason for keeping it alive, such as the existence of another incumbrance, equity will not destroy it. . . . The intention, therefore, if expressed, governs the case; but if no intention is expressed, then Toulmin v. Steere says that the incumbrance which is paid off is merged." Sir George Jessel treats the existence of another incumbrance as one reason, but says if there is any reason such as that the court will treat the mortgage as subsisting.

In Thorne v. Cann the case of Toulmin v. Steere was mentioned as having been criticized, but it was not overruled. Lord Macnaghten stated the law thus: "Nothing, I think, is better settled than this—that where the owner of an estate pays charges on the estate which he is not personally liable to pay, the question whether those charges are to be considered as extinguished or as kept alive for his benefit is simply a question of intention. You may find the intention in the deed, or you may find it in the circumstances attending the transaction, or you may presume an intention from considering whether it is or is not for his benefit that the charge should be kept on foot."

The purchasers paid £1,000 for Norton's concurrence. The words are large enough to pass any claim of Norton against the fund. Then is there, in the language of Sir George Jessel, any reason for keeping Norton's charge alive? Considering, in Lord Macnaghten's words, whether it is for the benefit of the purchaser to do so, must the intention to keep it alive be presumed?

If a charge were to be discovered, next after Norton's and before that of Lord Windsor, would Norton's debt be treated as merged? In my opinion it would not. It cannot be treated as alive for one purpose of benefit, and yet extinguished as regards another. In the circumstances of this case there is a material advantage to the plaintiffs, who are purchasers for value, in treating the debt as subsisting, and I cannot discover any reason to prevent them from invoking this doctrine of equity in their favour.

If Norton did not sanction the payments to Kennedy, Norton at the date of the assignment in 1893 had a claim, to the extent of the debt owing to him by Kennedy, upon the fund which is now in court in the other action, to share rateably in the proportion of Kennedy's original claim with Willoughby and Lord Henry Paulet. This right or benefit he assigned. If Kennedy had not such a right, it would obviously be for the benefit of the purchaser to keep Norton's right alive. Willoughby and Lord Henry Paulet are, I assume, innocent of any participation in Walker's wrong-doing by the payment he made to Kennedy. But Norton must be treated as equally innocent, and they, although they knew of his charge, would not make Norton a party to their action against Walker, in which the fund remaining was ultimately secured in court. I cannot see that Willoughby and Lord Henry Paulet, or those who represent him, have any equity to rebut this claim in the name of Norton.

On the whole, I think there was a strong reason in 1893 for keeping alive Norton's debt, and that there was a benefit to the plaintiffs in so doing which would justify a presumption of their intention to keep Norton's debt in existence.

Norton's claim against the fund in court in Willoughby v. Paulet would pass by his assignment in 1893 to the plaintiffs, and I cannot see that this should be treated as merged.

I therefore differ with reluctance from the judgment of the other members of this court.

In re HOBSON.
BALLISON v. HOBSON. (a.)

Mortgage of land in Yorkshire by deposit not registered—Subsequent mortgage by deed registered—Priority—Actual fraud—Yorkshire Registries Act, 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. 5), ss. 3, 7, 14.

The expression "actual fraud" used in section 14 of the Yorkshire Registries Act, 1884, means fraud in the ordinary popular acceptation of the term.

A. acted as solicitor on behalf of B. in arranging that D. should deposit with a bank the deeds relating to certain property in Yorkshire for the purpose of indemnifying B. against an overdraft at the bank. The deposit was made, but not registered. Subsequently A. took from D. a mortgage by deed of the same property, and, having registered such mortgage, claimed priority against the mortgage by deposit to the prejudice of B.

Held, that if A.'s claim to priority were allowed he would be guilty of actual fraud towards B., and that consequently he ought not to obtain such priority.

This was an application made by summons on behalf of W. C. Davies, one of the executors of the will of the late defendant, Evan Thomas, deceased, asking (1) whether, as between the executors of the will of the said Evan Thomas, deceased, the defendants W. P. Horne, F. Miers, J. G. Metcalfe, the National Provincial Bank of England (Limited), and T. E. Jones, the said bank and the said T. E. Jones were respectively or whether either of them was entitled to any and what charge upon the sum of £1,384 deposited in the Leeds branch of the said bank, being the proceeds of the sale of property which belonged to the defendant J. G. Metcalfe and the deceased defendant J. M. Buckley; and (2) if the said bank and the said T. E. Jones were respectively entitled to any such charge, which charge had priority.

The point raised by the summons turned upon the construction of the Yorkshire Registries Act, 1884.

The facts are very fully stated in the judgment of Stirling, J.

Bryn Roberts, for W. C. Davies, the applicant, stated the facts.

Macleod, for the bank, left the matter to the court; the bank having the personal liability of the trustees.

Younger, for J. G. Metcalfe.

(a.) Reported by W. SCOTT THOMPSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Hastings, Q.C., and Adams, for W. P. Horne and F. Miers, the surviving trustees.—Upon the evidence we submit that the bank had a charge upon the property, and Jones knew of it, and so under the law before the Act of 1884 he could not have gained priority by registering. Further, we submit that the Act of 1884 does not help him, for, in the first place, this being a security created by mere deposit of title deeds without any memorandum of deposit is not within that Act; and, secondly, if it is within the Act still the 14th section will not apply, for to allow Jones priority would be to enable him to commit an actual fraud within the proviso at the end of that section.

They referred to White v. Neaylon, 11 App. Cas. 171, 34 W. R. Dig. 186; Rolland v. Hart, 19 W. R. 962, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 678; Blades v. Blades, 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 358; Le Neve v. Le Neve, 2 Wh. & Tu. p. 26, and the definition of dolus malus by Labes therein referred to.

Hughes, for T. E. Jones.—On the facts we say that Metcalfe and Buckley withdrew from the arrangement, and gave notice to that effect to the bank shortly after they signed the letters of the 12th of June, 1888. These letters were so signed only upon the terms that a sum of £400 should be paid to Mrs. Buckley and Mrs. Metcalfe, which sum was never paid. But even if it is held that the bank did obtain a security by the deposit of the deeds, they are not entitled to priority against us, for the bank has never registered their security. The rule laid down in Sumpter v. Cooper, 2 B. & Ad. 223, that mortgages by mere deposit of deeds do not require to be registered has been altered by the Act of 1884. Further, we say that Mr. Jones has not been guilty of any fraud which would postpone him to the bank. He disclosed to Mr. Evan Thomas everything concerning the mortgage by Mr. Buckley to himself, and has been guilty of no breach of duty.

Hastings, Q.C., replied.

STIRLING, J.—This is a summons to determine a question of priorities between certain incumbrances on the share of James Mordaunt Buckley, deceased, on a property called the "Leylands," in Leeds.

Nothwithstanding the nature of the questions raised, all parties are desirous that it should be decided on the summons, and on the materials now before me. The order will be prefaced by a submission by all parties that the question should be decided as if an action had been brought and were now being tried.

The action is one for administration of the estate of Frederick Hobson, whose will was proved so far back as 1863. Judgment was given in the action in 1866, and it was thereby declared that the trusts of the will ought to be carried into effect. On the 10th of July, 1883, three gentlemen, Evan Thomas, William Pybus Horne, and Frederick Miers, were appointed trustees, and on the 2nd of August, 1884, the conduct of the proceedings was given to them. Part of the trust property consisted of the Leeds Times newspaper, which was carried on by the trustees under trusts in that behalf contained in the testator's will. For the purposes of the newspaper £2,000 had been raised by a mortgage on the premises where the paper was printed and published, and on the 24th of February, 1885, an order was made on the application of the trustees giving them liberty to raise a reserve fund to provide for and indemnify them against liability in respect of the sum of £2,000 by accumulating the sum of £150 annually out of the profits arising from the business, and they were to be at liberty to pay such moneys into court to the credit of "the mortgage redemption account." In 1888 much discussion took place between the trustees and their beneficiaries as to the propriety of reducing the price of the paper to one penny. The beneficiaries were Mrs. Metcalfe, wife of Rev. J. G. Metcalfe, and her children; Mrs. Buckley, wife of Mr. J. Mordaunt Buckley, and her children; and Mrs. Minors and her mortgagee, Mr. Paley; of these Mrs. Metcalfe and Mrs. Buckley and their respective husbands were strongly in favour of the proposed reduction, while Mrs. Minors and her mortgagee would have nothing to do with it. On the 12th of June, 1888, a meeting was held of persons who were favourable to the change. It was attended by Mr. W. P. Horne, one of the trustees, and Mr. Hopps, a solicitor of the firm of Hopps & Bedford, who acted as solicitors of Mr. Horne and also for Mr. and Mrs. Metcalfe. Mr. Evan Thomas was not present at that meeting, but he was upon that occasion and at other meetings represented by Mr. T. E. Jones, his solicitor. Mr. Jones also acted as solicitor for Mr. J. M. Buckley, who himself attended. The Rev. J. G. Metcalfe was also present. Minutes of proceedings were taken by Mr. Jones, and of these minutes the accuracy is not really in dispute. On the same day, the 12th of June, 1888, Mr. Hopps wrote to Messrs. Metcalfe and Buckley respectively identical letters asking them whether they were willing to lodge at the bank their title deeds of the Leylands property in order that the trustees under the will of the testator, F. Hobson, might be guaranteed against loss in continuing the business of the said testator; and on the same day Messrs. Metcalfe and Buckley wrote to Mr. Hopps in reply thereto to the effect that they assented to the deeds being so lodged with the bank.

This being done, an application was made to the court to sanction the alteration, and on the 18th of July, 1888, an order was made in the action, of which the concluding part is that the trustees be at liberty to borrow from their bankers, the Leeds branch of the National Provincial Bank of England (Limited), on the security of the testator's estate and of the guarantee of the defendants J. G. Metcalfe and James Mordaunt Buckley (which guarantee the said defendants, by their counsel, undertook to give to the said bank), a sum not exceeding £1,300 at a rate of interest not exceeding 5 per cent. per annum.

It is observable that nothing is said as to the nature of the guarantee which Messrs. Metcalfe and Buckley are to give. If the order alone be regarded, the guarantee would naturally be taken to be a personal guarantee, but there is nothing inconsistent with the view that it was to be such a guarantee as referred to in the letters of the 12th of June—viz., by deposit of deeds.

On the 9th of August another meeting took place, at which there were present Mr. Horne, Mr. Hopps, Mr. T. E. Jones (again representing Mr. Evan Thomas), Mr. Metcalfe, and Mr. Buckley. There are no minutes produced of this meeting, but Mr. Hopps and Mr. Horne, by their affidavits, state that the minutes of the meeting of the 12th of June were read, confirmed, and signed by the chairman, Mr. W. P. Horne, that the letters of Messrs. Metcalfe and Buckley of the 12th of June were also read, and that he (Hopps) himself reported the arrangements he had made as to depositing the deeds with the bank and opening and drawing on an overdraft account at the bank, and that these arrangements were approved by those present. There is no evidence to the contrary.

On the 1st of September, 1888, the title deeds were deposited with the bank by Mr. Hopps, the overdraft account was opened and was subsequently drawn upon. The paper was continued down to August, 1889, but having proved unsuccessful, the business was then sold by order of the court, and a balance of £1,288 or thereabouts remains due to the bank.

In the meantime, on the 19th of March, 1889, Mr. Jones took a mortgage from Mr. Buckley of his moiety of the property referred to in the letters of the 12th of June to secure a present advance of £200 and further advances. (This mortgage was registered by Mr. Jones in the West Riding Registry at Wakefield on the 21st of March, 1889.) Mr. Buckley has since died in insolvent circumstances, and the question is whether Mr. Jones' mortgage, being registered, takes priority over the security created by deposit of deeds with the bank.

Before dealing with the question of law which arises, I must consider certain issues of fact raised between the parties. First, it is said by Mr. Jones that Messrs. Metcalfe and Buckley, within a few hours after the receipt by Mr. Hopps of the letters of the 12th of June, gave him verbal notice that they withdrew the letters and withdrew from the contemplated arrangement. This is denied by Mr. Hopps, Mr. Metcalfe, and Mr. Horne, and seems to me inconsistent with the letters of Mr. Buckley, dated the 20th of June, 1888, and also of Mr. Jones himself, dated the 13th of December, 1889, and the 6th and 16th of May, 1890, which seem to me to admit the existence of the bank's lien. Next, it was said by Mr. Jones that the letters were given in consideration of a payment by the trustees to the beneficiaries of £400, which was not made. This is also denied, and appears inconsistent with the same letters. Thirdly, Mr. Jones says he, on the 19th of February, 1889, inquired of Mr. Hopps if any security had been given or arranged with the bank, and his reply was "No." This is denied by Mr. Hopps, and there the matter rests; but it seems to me that Mr. Jones' statement in his affidavit is inconsistent with those in his letters to which I have already referred. Lastly, it is said that the arrangement originally contemplated, whatever its nature, was put an end to by the order of July, 1888, and in support of this a letter of Mr. Hopps of the 25th of March, 1889, is referred to. The explanation given by Mr. Metcalfe is that the claim put forward in that letter was founded on a mistaken construction of the order. Whatever may be the explanation, it seems to me that the abandonment of the security is inconsistent with Mr. Jones' letters already referred to, and I hold it not made out. I come, therefore, to the conclusion of fact that the deeds were deposited with the bank by way of security in accordance with the letters of the 12th of June, 1888, and that on the 19th of March, 1889, Mr. Jones was aware of the fact.

As the law stood down to a recent period this finding of fact would have been sufficient to dispose of the case, upon two grounds. First of all, it was held under the Registration Acts of the reign of Anne that the provisions of those Acts did not apply to equitable mortgages created by deposit of deeds unaccompanied by any memorandum. That was decided in Sumpter v. Cooper. More than that, under the doctrine established by the well-known case of Le Neve v. Le Neve the security of the bank must have had priority over that of Mr. Jones, who took his security with full notice of the existence of it. It is, however, contended that this state of the law has been altered by the recent Registration Act of 1884, and it is necessary to consider that Act.

It is entitled "an Act to amend and consolidate the law relating to the registration of deeds, and other matters affecting lands and hereditaments within the North, East, and West Ridings of the County of York."

There are some of the definitions contained in the Interpretation Clause, s. 3, to which I may refer. [His lordship read the definitions of "conveyance," "mortgage," "memorandum of charge," and "assurance," and also read section 7.] Now, it was contended that the words "such lien or charge" in the concluding portion of the section meant a lien or charge accompanied by a memorandum such as is referred to in the prior part of the section. It does not seem to me that that is the true construction of the section. I think that the words "such lien or charge" have the same meaning as the words "such lien or charge," in the earlier part of the section —namely, a lien or charge claimed in respect of unpaid purchase money or by reason of any deposits of title deeds. I think the object of that section was to alter the law as laid down in Sumpter v. Cooper, and to deprive equitable mortgagees of priority unless a memorandum such as is described in the section has been registered. I may then pass on to section 14. It is to be observed that assurance includes any memorandum of charge, and that the term "memorandum of charge" extends to any memorandum or lien or charge which can be registered. Section 14 runs thus: [His lordship read the section.] Now I am far from saying that a question may not arise on the construction of that section, but it seems to me that the Legislature has twice over provided that the priorities given by the Act are not to be altered except in cases of "actual fraud," and I am certainly not disposed in any way to fritter away the language of the Act. I understand that term to mean fraud in the ordinary popular acceptation of the term, and not what has sometimes been called "legal" fraud, or "constructive" fraud, or "fraud in the eye of a court of law or a court of equity." At all events for the purpose of the present case I assume that to be the effect of the Act, and I must give effect to the priority claimed by Mr. Jones unless I can come to the conclusion that his case is brought within the exception.

Now, what is the position of Mr. Jones? At the time he took his security or charge he was the solicitor and agent for Mr. Evan Thomas in all matters relating to these particular trusts. Mr. Thomas never attended any of the meetings relative to the trust affairs, but was on all occasions represented by Mr. Jones; and the mortgage in question was executed by Mr. Buckley at a railway station when he and Mr. Jones were on their way to one of these very meetings. The letter of the 6th of May, 1890, commences with a complaint on the part of Mr. Jones that Mr. Hopps had sent a letter direct to Mr. Evan Thomas instead of himself, "well knowing as you do that I act for and represent Dr. Thomas in this matter."

Further, Dr. Thomas has since shown the extent of the confidence which he reposes in him by appointing him one of his executors, and he has proved the will together with his co-executors.

It appears to me, therefore, that under the circumstances at the time when he took his security, Mr. Jones had taken upon himself the duty of actively protecting the interests of Mr. Evan Thomas in connection with the trust. Had, then, Mr. Evan Thomas any interest in the security? The security was no doubt given to the bank, and the bank were the persons primarily interested in it, but it is a matter of indifference to them. They have got the personal security of the trustees, which is perfectly adequate, and they leave it entirely to the court to say whether the priority exists or no.

Then comes the question, Have the trustees as such an interest in this security? I think they have. The meaning of the whole arrangement was that the trustees should be guaranteed against loss by means of the deposit, and that is expressly stated in Mr. Hopps' letter of the 12th of June, 1888, where he says that the deposit of title deeds was made, not merely for the security of the bank, but "in order that the trustees" (of whom Mr. Evan Thomas was one) "may be guaranteed against loss in continuing the business of the testator. I think, therefore, that Mr. Evan Thomas had an interest in this mortgage. What, then, would be the duty of an agent who had taken upon himself the duty of actively protecting Mr. Evan Thomas' interests with reference to this mortgage. It would be this. If he discovered that the security in which the principal was interested was not duly perfected, so that some third party might possibly defeat it, he ought to do his best to get it perfected so as to prevent such defeat. That was his duty. Then could he behind the back of his client take advantage of such a defect, and gain a security for himself so as to defeat, pro tanto at any rate, the security of his principal. Certainly it would be a breach of duty, and to me it appears that if he did so and were acting in such a way, he certainly would be guilty of actual fraud. He was bound to abstain from taking or using a security over the property charged in favour of the bank to the prejudice of his principal, without making full disclosure and obtaining the sanction of that person, and the burden of proving that such disclosure was made and such sanction was given him lies also on the agent. On that I refer to Dunne v. English, L. R. 18 Eq. 524. Well then, what passed between Mr. Jones and Mr. Thomas on this subject? We have only the evidence as regards it of Mr. Jones.

There is no other proof than that founded on the affidavits. It appears to me that the statements in the two affidavits of Mr. Jones fall altogether short of what is required to prove knowledge, and to show that knowledge on the part of Mr. Evan Thomas. Mr. Jones nowhere states that he disclosed to Mr. Thomas that his security was to be taken or used in such a way as to prejudice Mr. Thomas. It is perfectly consistent with the statements of Mr. Jones in these affidavits that Mr. Thomas should have given his sanction to the security in the belief that the charge created by the deposit of deeds would not be affected.

No blame whatever can be attached to Mr. Jones so long as he does not avail himself of the security which he has obtained to the prejudice of Mr. Thomas or his estate; but it seems to me that to give effect to the priority which he claims under the registration would be to enable him to commit a fraud. That apparently was the view taken by Mr. Jones himself in the letter of the 6th of May, 1890, to which I have so often referred, and in my opinion it is much to be regretted that in these proceedings he should have put forward such a claim.

In my opinion, therefore, the security of the bank has priority over that of Mr. Jones.

Company—Winding up—Official receiver—Liquidator—Security for costs—Misfeasance summons—Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 63), s. 10.

Where the official receiver and liquidator of a company being wound up compulsorily and only having assets sufficient to pay a small dividend to the debenture-holders takes out a misfeasance summons against officers of the company he is at the mercy of the court as regards costs at the hearing of the summons, and the court has jurisdiction in such a case to order the liquidator personally to pay costs. The court in such a case, in considering whether the liquidator ought or ought not to be ordered to pay the costs personally, will have regard to the fact that an application for an order that he should give security for costs has been made and opposed by the liquidator.

These were summonses taken out by the respondents to a misfeasance summons which had been taken out by the official receiver and liquidator of the above-named company (which was being wound up by the court), asking that the official receiver and liquidator should give security for their costs on the misfeasance summons. It appeared that there was money in court sufficient to pay a small dividend to the debenture-holders of the company. The whole debenture debt amounted to more than £27,000, charged on the present and future property, including uncalled capital. A receiver had been appointed in a debenture-holders' action.

John Henderson, for the official receiver and liquidator, contended that there was no jurisdiction to order the liquidator to give security for costs.

Romer, J.—In my opinion a liquidator who initiates proceedings of this kind is at the mercy of the court as regards being ordered to pay costs at the hearing of the misfeasance summons. The court undoubtedly has jurisdiction to order a liquidator personally to pay costs, and in my opinion the court would do so in any case where it would be just that the liquidator should be ordered to pay the costs. And I think that the court, in considering whether the liquidator ought or ought not to be ordered to pay the costs personally, would have regard to the fact that an application for an order that he should give security for costs had been made and had been opposed, and that the court had refused to order security for costs on the ground that there would be jurisdiction at the trial to order him to pay them. It is on that ground, and on that ground alone, that I refuse in the present case to order the liquidator to give security for costs. The application will, therefore, be refused, but without costs.

Arbitration—Setting aside award—Umpire—Misconduct—Bias.

After the appointment of an umpire in an arbitration

(a) Reported by V. de S. Fowke, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a.) Reported by Sir Sherston Baker, Bart., Barrister-at-Law.

to determine the value of land compulsorily taken under the Lands Clauses Act, and before the reference, the umpire was retained to act as witness in another claim for one of the parties to the reference; and after the reference, but before the umpire had made his award, he gave evidence for such party as to the value of other land at some distance off taken for the same purposes and under the same Parliamentary powers.

Held, that the fact of the umpire appearing and giving evidence in another case for one of the parties, under the circumstances, did not entitle the other party to the reference to have the award set aside on the ground of misconduct or bias on the part of the umpire.

Application to set aside an award, on the grounds (1) that the umpire who made the award was not a disinterested person with regard to the subject matter of the reference; and (2) that the umpire had misconducted himself in that, subsequently to his appointment and during the pendency of the arbitration and before making his award, he had accepted a retainer from the respondent companies to act as their witness, and that he gave sworn evidence on their behalf in another arbitration in respect of land of a similar character, and in close proximity to the land of the claimant, which land was being acquired by the companies under the same powers and for the same purposes as the claimant's land.

Notice to treat was served on the claimant in January, 1895, in respect of some land of the claimant which the railway companies wanted to purchase compulsorily under the Lands Clauses Act. In May, 1895, arbitrators were appointed, and in June these arbitrators appointed as umpire Mr. Cross; Mr. Cross having been suggested by the company's arbitrator, and accepted by the claimant's arbitrator.

The reference took place on the 3rd and 4th of December, 1895; but before the reference was heard, and after the date of his appointment as umpire, Mr. Cross had been retained by the respondent companies to act as a witness on their behalf in an inquiry as to the value of land which the companies were taking from a Mr. Green for the same purposes and under the same Parliamentary powers. Mr. Green's land was at a distance from Mr. Haigh's land which was estimated in the affidavits at from one and a half to three miles, both being in the city of Liverpool.

Before the arbitration in Haigh's case took place, Mr. Cross, the umpire, went and viewed Green's land on behalf of the railway companies; and on the 13th and 14th of December—that is, after the arbitration in Haigh's case was heard, but before the umpire had made his award—the umpire gave evidence on behalf of the companies in Green's case; and on the 21st of December the umpire made and published his award in Haigh's case.

Mr. Haigh, the claimant, was dissatisfied with the award, and he now sought to set it aside on the above grounds.

Hon. J. W. Mansfield (Bigham, Q.C., with him), for the claimant.—No personal charge is here made against the umpire, and no suggestion is made that he has consciously acted improperly or misconducted himself. Our contention is that from the very position in which he placed himself, namely, the position of acting as a witness for one of the parties to the arbitration in another claim, he must have been unconsciously interested and biased in his judgment. At the very time he was conducting this arbitration he was retained as a witness and had consented to act as a witness for one of the parties in the claim made against them in Green's case. This employment on behalf of the companies was before he heard this reference; and then when the reference was over, but before he had made his award, he actually gave evidence for the companies with regard to the value of land in the immediate neighbourhood in Green's case. It is impossible under such circumstances that he could have been free from bias as to the subject matter of the reference. He referred to Clout v. The Metropolitan Railway Company, 46 L. T. N. S. 141, 30 W. R. Dig. 8.

H. D. Greene, Q.C., and C. A. Russell, for the respondent companies, and Rowlatt for the umpire, were not called upon.

DAY, J.—I think there is nothing in this application. I cannot suppose for a moment that the mind of an umpire or arbitrator is really or substantially affected by his giving evidence on behalf of one of the parties in another reference on a similar matter some little distance off. From my experience of expert witnesses and professional umpires and arbitrators, surveyors are constantly umpires in this class of cases, and they are constantly material witnesses in compensation cases. Liverpool is a very large city, and if solicitors want to get a competent umpire in Liverpool they must employ as umpire some person who often acts as professional witness for the same company in the same neighbourhood. It is necessary that you should have some person who is intimately acquainted with the incidents of property of this kind, and it is impossible to avoid employing persons who are frequently employed by railway companies in the neighbourhood with reference to cases of this kind. I think, therefore, that this application must be refused.

WRIGHT, J.—I feel more doubt about the matter myself, but, on the whole, I think the objection on the ground of bias is not sufficiently made out. There is no ground for suggesting that the umpire was interested. He was not in any sense interested, and bias would be the only ground, and all we know as to that is that he was a witness for the railway company as to some land between one and a half and three miles distant. That does not, to my mind, sufficiently show that he was likely to be biased. Rightly, no suggestion is made against him personally, and I agree that there is no such necessary incompatibility between the two positions as to justify us in saying that he cannot act. He is not a judge and a witness in the same matter; if he were, he could not act as judge. He is not a prosecutor and judge in the same matter, and I do not think that there is any decision which has gone so far as to show that this application ought to be granted. It is, however, highly desirable that, so far as possible, persons who act as umpires ought to inform the parties of anything which the parties might wish to know in deciding whether they will or will not assent to that person acting as an umpire.

Rowlatt, for the umpire, asked for costs; and his application was granted, as there was a charge of misconduct against the umpire and he was entitled to come to the court and protect his character.

REG. v. MAYOR, ALDERMEN, AND CORPORATION OF PLYMOUTH. (a.)

Fisheries Committee—Expenses of—Appointment of fishery officer—"Restrictions or conditions as to expenditure"—Fisheries Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 54), s. 6 (1).

Section 6 (1) of the Fisheries Act, 1888, provides that the committee of a fishery district created under that Act, "subject to any restrictions or conditions as to expenditure" made by the council or councils by whom they are appointed, may appoint fishery officers.

Held, that the section refers to restrictions and conditions in existence at the time of the appointment, and that a council is not exempt from contributing to the expenses of such an appointment, under section 10 of the Act, for the reason that they disapproved of the expenditure subsequently to the appointment.

Rule nisi calling upon the borough of Plymouth to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue commanding them to pay out of the borough fund to the treasurer of the Committee of the Devon Sea Fisheries District the sum of £112 10s., being the part payable by the borough of the expenses of the committee.

Part of the expenses consisted of money expended, or to be expended, by the committee in connection with the appointment of a fisheries inspector under section 6 of the Fisheries Act, 1888. Under that Act the Board of Trade had power to create a sea fisheries district and to constitute a committee for the regulation of the sea fisheries carried on within the district. The committee was to be a committee of the county councils and borough councils interested, with the addition of members representing the fishing interests of the district. A committee so constituted was to have power to make bye-laws, and, by section 6 (1), subject to any restrictions or conditions as to expenditure made by a council or councils by whom the committee was appointed, to appoint such fishery officers as they might deem expedient for the purpose of enforcing the observance within their district of bye-laws made by the committee. Section 10 provides that "the expenses of a local fisheries committee, so far as payable by a county council, shall, according as is provided by the order providing for the constitution of the local fisheries committee, be general or special expenses within the meaning of the Local Government Act, 1888, and, if special expenses, shall be charged in manner directed by the order, and the expenses of the committee, so far as payable by the council of a borough, shall be paid out of the borough rate or borough fund." In 1892 the Devon Sea Fisheries District was created by an order of the Board of Trade. The committee included the borough of Plymouth, who were to appoint five members and to contribute five eighteenth parts of the expenses of the committee out of the borough fund. The order of the Board of Trade also provided as follows: "Except as provided by section 6 of the Act, no council shall make, vary, or revoke any regulations or standing orders respecting the quorum or proceedings of the committee hereby constituted, or as to the area within which it is to exercise its authority; provided that any council may make a regulation requiring the committee to submit to such council once in each year an estimate of expenses proposed to be incurred by it under the Act, and once in each year a printed abstract of its accounts for the preceding year, and to afford to any person or persons appointed for the purpose by the council access at all reasonable times to the books containing its accounts. Subject to any restrictions or conditions made under section 6 of the Act, the committee shall not be required to report its proceedings to any council, nor shall its acts or proceedings be submitted to any council for approval."

The inspector was appointed in July, 1894. The expenses now claimed by the committee were the estimated expenses for the year ending August, 1895, and they included the salary of the inspector, together with other expenses connected with his appointment. A copy of the estimate was sent to the town clerk of the borough in August, 1894, accompanied by a demand for payment. The borough refused to pay, and at the next sitting of the council a resolution was passed disapproving of the expenditure of money upon the appointment of an inspector.

Lawson Walton, Q.C., and Bonsey showed cause.—The borough were not liable to pay expenses which were only estimated expenses. Having disapproved of the appointment, the borough were not liable to contribute to the expenses of it.

Channell, Q.C., and Duke, in support of the rule.—It is absurd to suppose that the borough were not liable to pay estimated expenses, for otherwise the committee would be obliged to provide for the current expenses out of their own pockets. Section 6 (1) implies that the disapproval by a council of the appointment of an officer must be made prior to the appointment, and their subsequent expression of disapproval cannot affect the borough's liability to contribute.

Cur. adv. vult.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., who delivered the judgment of the court, after stating the facts, proceeded:—It is agreed that these expenses are general expenses. That being so, apart from the section in the Fisheries Act which governs the appointment of the inspector, if we turn to the Local Government Act, 1888, we find that section 81 (6) provides how they are to be defrayed. They are to be defrayed by the council or councils by whom the committee is appointed, and there is no provision giving them any veto to control the expenditure. When we look at the order of the Board of Trade, we find that they have taken the same view, namely, that, except in the case of section 6 (1), the committee were not subject to review by the councils who appointed them, except that any council had a right to call upon the committee to submit an estimate of its expenditure for the coming year.

It does not appear that the borough did require any such estimate, nor did they impose any restrictions or conditions with regard to appointments made under section 6 (1). That being so, it would seem that the appointment under section 6 (1) is a valid appointment, subject only to restrictions and conditions as to expenditure made by the borough. Now, if those words "restrictions or conditions as to expenditure" mean restrictions or conditions made at the time of the appointment of the officer, then, there having been none, it would seem that the borough were liable to contribute, for no restrictions made afterwards can affect the appointment. But if, on the other hand, they mean restrictions not made at the time but made afterwards, then, it being the fact that the borough have since made restrictions, it would follow that the appointment would be made subject to those restrictions, and the borough would only have to contribute subject to the restrictions it had laid down. But in my opinion the words mean restrictions and conditions in existence at the time of the appointment; and as there were no such restrictions the exercise by the committee of their powers under the Act was a valid exercise, and the borough must contribute towards the expenses. With regard to future years the appointment will be made subject to any restrictions the borough might think fit to impose.

It was suggested that a hardship was involved, because the borough might have fresh expenditure imposed on it which they would not have had an opportunity of providing against. The answer is, firstly, that in this case the borough had ample notice, namely, since October 1893; and, secondly, that the matter is provided for in the order of the Board of Trade, for it is in the power of any council to call upon the committee to furnish them with an estimate. That would inform the council of the proposed expenditure, and they would then have an opportunity of imposing restrictions if they wished to do so.

I only wish to add that this seems to be the only practical construction of the section. It would be most unfortunate if the words of the Act were such that the borough, having had notice that the appointment was to be made, after the expenditure had been actually incurred, could come in and say that they had made a restriction. The fact of the matter is that, if one looks at the whole scope of the Act, it is obviously the intention of the Legislature that the restrictions should be made in advance. I have not gone at length into the other points, but we have considered each one, and this is the only one about which we had any doubt.

From Q. B. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and A. L. Smith and Rigby, L.JJ.) — April 22, 23, 24; May 16.

THE LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL v. THE CHURCHWARDENS AND OVERSEERS OF THE PARISH OF LAMBETH. (a.)

Poor rate — Beneficial occupation — London County Council—Assessment of public park—Annual value—Hypothetical tenant — London Council (General Powers) Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. ccxliii.), ss. 4, 5.

The London County Council are not rateable for the relief of the poor in respect of land and buildings purchased and maintained by them for the use of the public as a park or recreation ground under the London Council (General Powers) Act, 1890, the occupation of such park not being of any net annual value to them as hypothetical tenants.

This was an appeal by the London County Council from a decision of the Divisional Court (Pollock, B., and Wright, J., the 8th of August, 1895) [1895] 2 Q. B. 511, whereby it was held that the London County Council were liable to be rated for the relief of the poor in respect of their occupation of lands and buildings which they had purchased and laid out as a public park and recreation ground under the provisions of the London Council (General Powers) Act, 1890.

Case stated by consent and by order of Bruce, J., pursuant to section 11 of 12 & 13 Vict c. 45, upon an appeal by the London County Council to the Court of Quarter Sessions for the County of London against a poor rate.

1. In a poor rate made by the respondents for the parish of Lambeth, on the 7th of April, 1894, the appellants are assessed as occupiers of the premises and hereditaments hereinafter mentioned, in the several amounts shown by the extract from the rate-book as follows:

"No. 1473. Name of occupier: London County Council. Name of owner: ——. Description of property rated: House. No. of house and name or situation of property: Norwood-road. Gross estimated rental: £184. Rateable value: £154. Poor rate at 1s. 9d. in the £: £13 9s. 6d.

"No. 1475. Name of occupier: London County Council. Name of owner: Blackburn, J. Description of property rated: Land. No. of house and name or situation of property: Norwood-road. Gross estimated rental: £180. Rateable value: £171. Poor rate at 1s. 9d. in the £: £14 19s. 3d.

"No. 1483. Name of occupier: London County Council. Name of owner: ——. Description of property rated: Lodge. No. of house and name or situation of property: Norwood-road. Gross estimated rental: £12. Rateable value: £10. Poor rate at 1s. 9d. in the £: 17s. 6d.

"No. 1487. Name of occupier: London County Council. Name of owner: ——. Description of property rated: Cottage. No. of house and name or situation of property: Norwood-road. Gross estimated rental: £30. Rateable value: £24. Poor rate at 1s. 9d. in the £: £2 2s."

2. The appellants, the London County Council, are the governing body of the administrative county of London, and under divers Acts of Parliament hold, maintain, and regulate certain public parks, recreation grounds, and open spaces.

3. Previously to the passing of the London Council (General Powers) Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. ccxliii.), the said hereditaments and premises, known collectively as Brockwell Park, were in private ownership, and were included in the valuation list for the time being in force in the said parish and upon which the poor rate mentioned is based, and were assessed to the poor rate of the said parish.

4. The appellants, pursuant to the powers conferred by the said Act of 1890, in the year 1891 acquired the said hereditaments, and the same were conveyed to them by deed dated the 26th of March, 1891, as hereinafter mentioned.

5. From the time the said hereditaments were acquired by the appellants, the appellants have been rated and assessed for the said hereditaments to the poor rates of the said parish made respectively on the 11th of April, 1891, the 26th of September, 1891, the 9th of April, 1892, the 29th of September, 1892, the 8th of April, 1893, and the 7th of October, 1893; but payment of the rates for the said hereditaments was not demanded in respect of the poor rates made on the 11th of April, 1891, the 26th of September, 1892, and the 8th of April, 1893. The house and land were from the 26th of March, 1891, until the 6th of June, 1892, unoccupied and unused.

Sections 4 and 5 of the said London Council (General Powers) Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. ccxliii.), are as follows:

"(4) The council may purchase and take by agreement certain lands in the parish of Lambeth, in the county of London, known as Brockwell Park, as shown on the plan of Brockwell Park, and when the council shall have acquired the same, they shall hold the same and every part thereof as a park, and shall lay out and maintain and preserve the same and every part thereof as a park, for the perpetual use thereof by the public for exercise and recreation, and may from time to time exercise all necessary powers for the maintenance and preservation of the same as a park, provided that the council may, if they think fit, inclose the said lands or any other part thereof with a view to the better or more effectual preservation thereof for public use, and retain or remove, alter, enlarge, or adapt any buildings thereon, for any purpose which they may think conducive to the public benefit.

"(5) The council may erect and maintain in the said park huts and lodges, for the accommodation of keepers, constables, and other persons employed by the council in connection with the maintenance and management of the park, and also such other convenient and ornamental buildings as they may think requisite for refreshment rooms, band stands, conveniences, and other like purposes."

7. By the before-mentioned deed of the 26th of March, 1891, the said hereditaments were conveyed to the appellants to hold the same unto and to the use of them, their successors, and assigns for ever, to the end and intent that the same may be used as and for a public park under the provisions of the said London Council (General Powers) Act, 1890, and they now hold the same under the powers and subject to the provisions in the said Act contained.

8. Brockwell Park occupies about 78 acres, and is inclosed on all sides.

9. The house numbered 1473 in the said rate-book (formerly the mansion house) is a two-storied building which has been divided by the appellants into two parts, completely separated from one another by partition walls, and entered by separate entrances, being the original front and back doors respectively of the old mansion house.

10. Of the part which is entered by the original front door, the ground floor and basement are occupied as refreshment rooms, the same being held for the year ending the 31st of March, 1895, under a licence or agreement, while the upper floor, consisting of several good-sized rooms, is unused. Such last-mentioned rooms might be let to a tenant from year to year for £20 a year, if right of access at all times could be given to him consistently with the provisions of the said Act and the bye-laws hereinafter mentioned.

11. The part which is entered by the original back door, consisting of eight living rooms and a small office, is occupied by the resident superintendent of the park and his family. Such resident superintendent is reasonably necessary for the protection and proper management of the said park for the purposes of the said Act. He is paid by the appellants a salary, in fixing which is taken into account the fact that he has the rooms rent free, water and gas being found by the appellants. Similar accommodation in the way of rooms could not be found for him in the immediate neighbourhood of the said park for a less rent than £40 a year as tenant from year to year.

12. The buildings, yard, and premises formerly used as coachhouse, stables, and outbuildings in connection with the said mansion house, have been partly converted for public use into a gymnasium for children, conveniences for men and women, and a children's shelter, and partly into a cottage for a constable to live in, consisting of four living rooms, a carpenter's shop for the use of men specially employed by the appellants on necessary repairs in the said park, a lock-up store, an office, a tool shed, and a bothy for the men to have their meals in. The said cottage, shop, store, shed, and bothy, as well as the said gymnasium, conveniences, and shelter, are all properly used as aforesaid by the appellants for the purposes of managing the said park under the said Act, and it is considered necessary by the County Council, and is proper for the protection of the said park and its contents that the said constable should reside in the said cottage. Such last-mentioned cottage could not be let except at a merely nominal rent to anyone except in connection with the whole establishment formerly constituting the mansion house.

13. The lodge and cottage numbered 1483 and 1487 in the said rate-book are small cottages, the former containing three rooms and the latter containing five rooms and having a small yard at the back, the only entrance to each being inside the park gates. These cottages are used as residences for two constables, who are allowed by the appellants to occupy them rent free in consideration of the extra duty they undertake of looking after the gates, of which they have the keys, and protecting the park at night. It is considered necessary by the County Council, and is proper for the protection of the said park and its contents, that the said constables should reside in the said cottages. If the said cottages could be let by the County Council, unhampered by the provisions of the said Act and the bye-laws hereinafter mentioned, they would fetch rents sufficient to support the figures in the said rate-book.

14. All the land in the said park, numbered 1475 in the said rate-book, is open to the public at large as a park and recreation ground during the daytime, but at night the gates are locked and the public are not admitted. This is necessary for the protection of the park and to prevent its being turned to improper uses at night.

15. Certain bye-laws have been made and are applicable to the said park, amongst other open spaces, under the 14th section of the said Act, and the constables are by warrant required to enforce the same under the 17th section of the said Act. By No. 1 of such bye-laws (the whole of which may be referred to by either party) the following acts and things (amongst others) are prohibited and declared to be offences—viz.: "(36) Refusing to leave any park, garden, or other enclosed place at or after the time of closing the gates in the evening, if requested to do so by any officer or police constable, or wilfully remaining therein after the gates are closed in the evening, or climbing on or over the gates, fences, or railings." And by No. 2 penalties are provided for a breach of the bye-laws.

16. The grass in the said park is kept down by the appellants, so as to be in a fit state for public use, partly by mowing and partly by grazing. The grazing is done under an agreement or licence with a licensee, by which such licensee is entitled to the grazing of this and several other public open spaces in consideration of a payment. The above is a reasonable and economical course for the appellants to take for the purpose of carrying out their duties under the 4th section of the said Act.

17. Amongst other arrangements reasonable and proper for the recreation of the public, the appellants have laid out and maintain thirty lawn tennis grounds and thirteen cricket pitches in the said park.

18. The necessary expenses of maintaining the park as a whole, with the buildings on it, for the purposes of the said Act far exceed any sums of money which are or could be derived from licences for the supply of refreshments or for grazing rights or otherwise. The actual expenses exceed £2,000 a year.

19. If the hereditaments assessed in the said rate had remained in the same state of use and occupation in which they were prior to the passing of the said Act, the rateable value thereof would have been sufficient to support the figures set out in the said rate.

20. The total purchase money for the said park in 1891 was £117,000, of which £62,000 only was provided by the appellants, the balance being made up of contributions from other public bodies.

21. If the appellants had had a duty to provide an open space for the public in the said locality, and for the purpose of carrying out that duty had had the power and the wish, instead of purchasing the said park, to take it as lessees or tenants and pay a rent for the same, they would have had to pay a rent for the same sufficient to support the figures in the said rate.

22. The respondents contend that the facts as above stated show an occupation of all or some of the said hereditaments by the appellants, and that such occupation was under the circumstances above stated a beneficial occupation; and that even if the occupation of the appellants was in fact not beneficial to them, yet they were properly rated to the relief of the poor in sums justifying the said respective rates.

23. The appellants contend that under the circumstances they are not rateable at all for any portion of the said property; or that if rateable, the rateable value is nil.

The questions for the opinion of the court are:—

(1) Whether the appellants are rateable in respect of all or any, and if any which, portion of the said hereditaments.

(2) If the appellants are rateable, whether they are rateable at a nominal amount only in respect of all or any, and if any what, portion of the said hereditaments.

If the court should be of opinion that the appellants are rateable for the whole of the said hereditaments upon the same basis as their predecessors, the late occupiers thereof, then the rate is to stand.

If the court should be of opinion that the last preceding supposition is incorrect, but that nevertheless the appellants are rateable for the said hereditaments taken separately on the basis of there being, notwithstanding the said Act of Parliament, a beneficial occupation of (a) the hereditaments formerly comprised in the old mansion house, numbered 1473; (b) the land, numbered 1475; (c) the lodge, numbered 1483; or (d) the cottage, numbered 1487, then the rate is, for the purposes only of this case, to be amended by changing the rateable value of (a) from £154 to £77, of (b) from £171 to £85, of (c) from £10 to £5, and of (d) from £24 to £12 respectively, with corresponding reductions in each case of the gross estimated rentals.

If the court should be of opinion that all the said hereditaments, or any portion or portions thereof, are either not rateable or rateable at nil, then the rate is to be quashed, or quashed pro tanto, as the case may be.

If the court should be of opinion that none of the above contentions or bases are right, the rate is to be amended in accordance with the judgment of the court, whatever it may be.

Bosanquet, Q.C., and Horace Avory, for the appellants.

Lawson Walton, Q.C., Coward, and Hole, for the respondents.

The arguments of counsel sufficiently appear in the above case and in the following written judgments.

Cur. adv. vult.

The following written judgment was read by

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The main question raised by this special case is what, upon the facts stated, as a matter of law, was the rateable value of Brockwell Park, which had in the year 1891 become one of the public parks of London, when it was rated to the relief of the poor by the overseers of the parish of Lambeth upon the 7th of April, 1894. Was its rateable value then the same as it had been prior to its becoming a public park, or had its rateable value been thus reduced to a nominal or what other sum?

The overseers have assessed the park at its rateable value prior to its having become a public park. Their counsel did not, however, at the bar contend for this, or for anything like it; but he argued that this court should hold that the facts of the special case showed that, as a matter of law, its rateable value was other than nominal, or, as he said, something in excess of nil. The material facts, as they appear upon the case, are these. Prior to the year 1890, when the London Council (General Powers) Act (53 & 54 Vict. c. ccxliii.) was passed Brockwell Park belonged to a private owner, and consisted of seventy-eight acres of land, with a mansion house, lodge, and cottage thereon. It was then rated to the relief of the poor at a net annual rateable value of £359; and it is not disputed that this was then its rateable value. By the Act of 1890, s. 4, the Legislature empowered the London County Council, if they thought fit, to purchase Brockwell Park, and it enacted "that when the Council shall have acquired the same they shall . . . . lay out, maintain, and preserve the same and every part thereof as a park for the perpetual use thereof by the public for exercise and recreation." In the year 1891 the London County Council exercised the option so given to them, and subscribed towards its purchase £60,000, the residue of the purchase money, £57,000, being obtained from other sources. The case finds "that the necessary expenses of maintaining the park as a whole, with the buildings on it, for the purposes of the Act far exceed any sums of money which are or could be derived from licences for refreshments or for grazing or otherwise." "The actual expenses exceed £2,000 a year," in other words, when the rate was made in September 1894, the London County Council were necessarily heavy pecuniary annual losers by reason of the obligation imposed upon them by the statute to maintain the park as a park for the perpetual use thereof by the public for exercise and recreation. The London County Council were not empowered to let the park or any part of it, or to use any part of it in any other way than as a public park for the recreation of the public for ever. It never can be abandoned as a public park, but must remain a public park for ever, kept up at the expense of the London County Council. In considering whether a hereditament is a rateable hereditament or not, in my judgment in the first place it must be determined whether its occupation is capable of value in any person's hands whatsoever. If yes, then it is a rateable hereditament; aliter if it is not. The counsel who appeared for the London County Council, very properly, in my judgment, admitted that Brockwell Park, though its rent-producing capacity was fettered as above mentioned, was a rateable hereditament, and I therefore need not embark upon the theory of land being struck with sterility in any and everybody's hands; for the question before us is whether, taking the conditions under which the London County Council were by the statute of 1890 bound for ever to occupy the park, there are findings in this case which render the rateable value of that occupation other than nominal.

Now, as regards the law to be applied to the rating to the relief of the poor of a rateable hereditament under the statute of Elizabeth, there are three well-known legal landmarks. First, the Parochial Assessment Act (6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 96), which was passed in the year 1836, by which was enacted the rule whereby the rateable value of the occupancy of a hereditament is to be ascertained; secondly, the case of Jones v. The Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, 11 H. L. C. 443, at p. 461, in the year 1864 in the House of Lords, which laid down how this rule was to be applied; and thirdly, the case of Reg. v. The School Board for London, 34 W. R. 583, 17 Q. B. D. 738, in this court in the year 1886, in which it was for the first time held that the occupying owner was to be taken into account as a possible hypothetical tenant when arriving at the rateable value of a hereditament. Lord Blackburn (then Blackburn, J.), in delivering the opinion of the majority of judges in the House of Lords in the case of Jones v. The Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, thus laid down the rule. He said the Parochial Assessment Act has enacted "that no rate shall be valid unless made upon an estimate of the net annual value of the several hereditaments rated thereunto; that is to say, of the rent at which the same might reasonably be expected to let from year to year, free of all usual tenant's rates and taxes and tithe commutation rent-charge, if any, and deducting therefrom the probable average annual cost of repairs, insurance, and other expenses, if any, necessary to maintain them in a state to command such rent." In order, therefore, that a valid rate may be imposed, it is essential that the occupation should be of value beyond what is required to maintain the property; for if the occupation be of so little value that the hypothetical tenant (under the Parochial Assessment Act) would either give no rent, or a rent which, after deducting the annual expenses of the maintenance, would leave no overplus, there is nothing to rate." This rule was adopted by the House, and is the undoubted law on the subject. The Lord Chancellor (Lord Westbury) said: "Having regard to the Parochial Assessment Act, 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 96, it may be said in answer that occupation to be rateable must be of property yielding or capable of yielding a net annual value, that is to say, a clear rent over and above the probable average cost of the repairs, insurance, and other expenses, if any, necessary to maintain the property in a state to command such rent. It is in this sense that I understand the words 'beneficial occupation,' wherever it is said that to support a rate the occupation must be a beneficial one. For, on principle, it is by no means necessary that the occupation should be beneficial to the occupiers. It is sufficient if the property be capable of yielding a clear rent over and above the necessary outgoings." This rule has been ever since acted upon down to the present time. I will take one instance from among the many by way of example. In the case of The Mayor of Liverpool (Appellants) v. The Overseers of Wavertree, 2 Ex. D. 55*n*, Blackburn, J., in delivering judgment, said: "The whole question turns on the rule given by the Parochial Assessment Act, which says that the occupier is rateable at what a tenant from year to year will give as the rent, who takes the land subject to the same restrictions as those under which the appellants hold it. Now the tenant would only give such a rent as the restrictions imposed by statute would enable him to earn; and the rateable value is to be based upon that rent." This is the rule, and it is settled and plain; it is in its application to different sets of facts that difficulty has arisen, as will be seen from the many cases in the law reports upon the subject. From the year 1836 down to the year 1886 the hypothetical tenant was assumed to be a person other than the occupying owner of the hereditament sought to be rated; and had the law remained so until now, I cannot doubt that the present contention of the respondents would have been hopelessly untenable, for it is plain enough, and indeed it is admitted by their counsel, that no hypothetical tenant (leaving out of consideration the occupying owner, the London County Council, as a possible hypothetical tenant) would in April, 1894, have given a farthing of rent, to use Lord Blackburn's expression in The Mayor of Lincoln v. Holmes Common, 15 W. R. 786, L. R. 2 Q. B. 482, for Brockwell Park, subject to the restrictions and prohibitions imposed upon the occupancy of the park by the Legislature in 1890. In the year 1886, however, matters changed, and the case of Regina v. The School Board for London came up for determination in this court.

The question was whether the School Board, who were occupying owners of the premises sought to be rated, were to be excluded when inquiring what rent a hypothetical tenant would have been willing to give for the school premises; and it was held that the School Board had the duty imposed upon it by the Legislature to provide school premises for educational purposes, and might, if they had not purchased the premises sought to be rated, have been induced or forced to become tenants of them, and, as they had power to rent premises, they were not to be excluded when considering the possible hypothetical tenant. Then came the case of Owen's College v. Overseers of Chorlton-upon-Medlock, 55 L. T. N. S. 737, before the late Stephen, J., and me in the Divisional Court, when we held, following the case of Regina v. School Board for London that, in considering what rent the hypothetical tenant would be likely to give, the occupying owner—i.e., Owen's College—was to be taken into consideration. I find from the Law Times report of this case that it was admitted before us that a solvent tenant would have given such a rent as tenant from year to year as would support a rateable value of either £1,000 or £1,300; the respondent's contention being that the rateable value of the college should be assessed upon the calculation of 4 per cent. upon the cost price of erecting the buildings, which brought out the rateable value of £3,285, which was what the college appealed against. This last argument we discarded, and I think rightly so; and we followed Regina v. The School Board for London, and included the occupying owner as a possible tenant, and upheld the rate at £1,300. Upon appeal this court held (35 W. R. 226, 18 Q. B. D. 403) that, although the trustees of the college had a duty imposed upon them by law of maintaining a college for educational purposes, yet, inasmuch as it was by law incapacitated from renting the premises sought to be rated, it was to be excluded from consideration as a possible hypothetical tenant.

In the year 1889, in the case of The Mayor, &c., of Burton-upon-Trent v. The Assessment Committee of Burton-upon-Trent, 38 W. R. 181, 24 Q. B. D. 197, at page 207, the principle laid down in the case of Reg. v. School Board for London was acted upon in this court, it being held that the Mayor and Corporation of Burton-upon-Trent, who were occupying owners, had a duty imposed upon them to dispose of the sewage, and were competent to have become tenants for that purpose of the premises sought to be rated. They were therefore held to be in the category of possible hypothetical tenants; and this case was distinguished from the case of Owen's College v. Overseers of Chorlton-upon-Medlock upon the ground that the Mayor and Corporation were competent possible hypothetical tenants, whereas in Owen's College case the college was not. So matters, so far as material, rested until the year 1893, when these three last-mentioned cases came under review in the House of Lords in the case of The London County Council v. Churchwardens of Erith Parish, 42 W. R. 330, [1893] A. C. 562, at pages 590 and 596. It was there held that the cases of Reg. v. School Board for London, and of the Mayor and Corporation of Burton-upon-Trent, in which it had been held that the occupying owner was to be taken into account as a possible hypothetical tenant, were rightly decided; but that the case of Owen's College, in which he was excluded, was not rightly decided. Lord Herschell, C. ([1893], A. C. 562, at page 596), gives his reasons for this conclusion as follows: "An owner who is in occupation of premises can, of course, never reasonably be expected to take them as tenant from year to year—he cannot become tenant to himself. Yet it has been held that the rent which, if the property were in other hands, he would be willing to pay may be taken into account when inquiring what is its annual value—that is, at what sum it might reasonably be expected to let from year to year. If the hypothesis be admissible that the owner might himself be amongst the possible tenants, although as a matter of fact he could not be so, it seems to me no more violent hypothesis to conceive him as amongst the possible tenants, even although he may be subject to certain legal restrictions which would prevent him becoming so." This opinion of Lord Herschell, C., was approved of by the House. There can be at the present day no doubt whatever that the London County Council, as occupying owners of Brockwell Park, are to be taken into consideration as possible hypothetical tenants; and this brings me to the point, which in my judgment is the real point, whether the facts stated in the special case show, as a matter of law, that the London County Council would, as hypothetical tenants, have been willing upon the 7th of April, 1894, to have given a rent in excess of what any other hypothetical tenant would have given, which it is not contended would have been in excess of a nominal rent.

The London County Council owed no duty whatever to anyone to provide a park for the public at Brockwell or anywhere else, though their doing so was, no doubt, prompted by philanthropic purposes for the benefit of the public, whose representatives they were; but benefit to the public is not a value which can be taken into consideration when ascertaining what rent a hypothetical tenant would give for a hereditament.

The question is, What value is the hereditament to the hypothetical tenant? Blackburn, J., in Jones v. The Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, 11 H. L. C. 443, at p. 478, pointed this out. He said: "The rate is to be withheld" (this must be a misprint for either "imposed" or "upheld") "not in respect of the value of the benefit conferred on the public, or on that portion of it which uses the dock, but is to be imposed on the occupier of the docks in respect of the value to them" (i.e., the dock company) "derived from the payments taken for that use." In the case of Hare v. The Overseers of Putney, 29 W. R. 721, 7 Q. B. D. 223, in this court, this statement of the law, as it appears to me, was adopted. In that case the Metropolitan Board of Works, pursuant to statute, purchased Putney Bridge from its owners, took off the tolls, and threw it open to the public toll free. The occupation of the bridge thereafter never was of value to the Metropolitan Board of Works, though it undoubtedly was of the greatest value to the public whose representatives the Metropolitan Board of Works were, and it was held that this fact did not support the rate made upon the Metropolitan Board of Works. There is no finding in this case that the London County Council would give a farthing of rent for Brockwell Park. All that is found is this (paragraph 21): "If the appellants had had a duty to provide an open space for the public in the said locality, and for the purpose of carrying out that duty had had the power and wish, instead of purchasing the said park, to take it as lessees and tenants and pay a rent for the same, they would have had to pay a rent for the same sufficient to support the figures of the rate." On the other hand, it is found that the London County Council must necessarily be annual heavy pecuniary losers by reason of being bound by statute to keep up the park for ever for the recreation of the public. Then how, as a matter of law, is it to be said that the London County Council would be willing to give as hypothetical tenants more than a nominal rent? In all the cases cited in which an occupying owner has been brought within the category of hypothetical tenant as being willing to give more rent than any other hypothetical tenant, there has been not only the duties imposed upon such owner of providing what the Legislature has required shall be provided by him, but (except in the case of Reg. v. School Board for London) there has been a specific finding that if he had not been occupying owner he would have given a rent sufficient to support the rate. In Reg. v. School Board for London there was the duty to provide a school house, and the sole point decided by this court (and the judgments are explicit as to this) was that the occupying owner was to be considered as a possible hypothetical tenant, nothing more. In the Owen's College case there was the duty to provide premises for educational purposes, and in that case, as before stated, the argument proceeded upon the admission that the college as hypothetical tenant would give a rent sufficient to uphold a rateable value of either £1,000 or £1,300, although the college could not be worked at a profit. There was a similar duty in the case of Mayor and Corporation of Burton-upon-Trent v. Assessment Committee of Burton-upon-Trent, namely, a duty to provide a sewage farm to deal with the sewage, and in that there was also the finding that, although the farm and pumping station as part of the sewage system could not be worked at a profit, if the farm and pumping station belonged to a private owner, the appellants would hire them at a rent sufficiently high to maintain the rate; and lastly, in the Erith case, in the House of Lords, Lord Herschell, at p. 579, commences his speech—and it is the foundation of his opinion—by pointing out that it was found in the special case, paragraph 10, that the London County Council, if they had not been occupying owners of the outfall works and pumping station sought to be rated, would have been willing to pay as yearly tenants a rent for the same sufficient to support the rate. This same finding will be found in all the three cases which were then argued together in the House of Lords. Now, a great deal has been said in this court, both in this case and in the Hull Docks Company v. Guardians, &c., of Sculcoates Union, 42 W. R. 595, [1894] 2 Q. B. 69, as to what the House of Lords decided in the Erith case, and I desire to state what in my judgment the House of Lords laid down therein. It is this. First, it reaffirmed what had been affirmed in the year 1864 by the House of Lords in Jones v. The Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, namely, that to render a hereditament rateable its occupation must be of value to someone, and that it was not essential to rateability that a particular occupier of the land should be able to make a pecuniary profit out of it; secondly, it held that the occupying owner was to be taken into account as a possible hypothetical tenant when ascertaining what rent a hypothetical tenant would give for the premises about to be rated, even although the occupying owner was prohibited by statute from renting the premises; thirdly, it left the rule as to the method of ascertaining the rateable value precisely where it was before. And as regards the case of an occupying owner being taken as a hypothetical tenant, Lord Herschell, at page 593, says: "The whole of the circumstances and conditions under which the owner has become occupier must be taken into consideration, and no higher rent must be fixed as the basis of assessment than that which it is believed the owner would really be willing to pay for the occupation of the premises." The question as to what rent the hypothetical tenant, whether occupying owner or not, would be willing to give as tenant from year to year, over and above the expenditure to command the rent, is necessarily one of fact.

The argument that the House of Lords has determined in the Erith case that an occupying owner must in every case be willing to give more than a nominal rent is in my judgment wholly untenable. The House of Lords decided no such thing, and the subsequent case of Sculcoates Union in the House of Lords, 43 W. R. 623, [1895] A. C. 136, shows that this is so. To state it shortly, it decided that, it having been found as a fact that had the London County Council not been occupying owners of the works sought to be rated they would have been willing to pay a yearly rent for the same sufficient to support the rate, applying the ordinary well-known rule, this rent was the basis upon which to ascertain the rateable value of the works, even although the London County Council were by law prohibited from renting the premises; and that it was nihil ad rem to show in answer to such a finding that no profit could be made out of the occupying of the premises by the London County Council. Now, as before stated, there is no finding in this case that the London County Council would have been willing to have paid any rent other than nominal, or indeed any rent at all; and I must point out that this is very remarkable and worthy of notice, seeing what the special findings in the Erith case and other cases argued therewith, and in the case of Mayor, &c., of Burton-upon-Trent v. Assessment Committee of Burton-upon-Trent Union, had been, and which must have been before the advisers of the respondents when this special case was settled. It is obvious that the respondents have been unable to obtain any such finding, and have been obliged to content themselves with the finding that if the London County Council had had a duty to provide an open space for the public in the said locality (which they had not), they would have had to pay a rent for the same sufficient to support the figures in the rate, a very different finding indeed from that upon which the prior cases were adjudicated. There being no such finding, how can this court, as a matter of law, hold that the London County Council would have been willing to give anything in excess of a nominal rent for the occupying of the park, when upon the facts found they must for ever be large annual pecuniary losers by having to keep up the park? The point taken in argument, that because the London County Council had given towards the purchase of the park £60,000 that shows, as a matter of law, that they would have been willing to give more than a nominal rent for the park, is in my judgment unsound. Take, for instance, the case, now unfortunately in some counties of England by no means of uncommon occurrence, of an occupying owner having in years gone by purchased an agricultural farm which of late years can only be worked at a dead out-of-pocket loss, and for which no tenant can be found to give any rent at all over and above the expenditure necessary to command the rent. Is it to be said, as a matter of law, that the occupying owner, because he had sunk his money in the farm, would give more than a nominal rent for that farm at the present time? Again, how can it be said, as a matter of law, that either from philanthropic motives or in order to ingratiate themselves with their constituents the London County Council would have given more than a nominal rent for Brockwell Park? Even if this could legitimately be considered, it appears to me impossible so to hold, and yet this is what we are in reality asked to do upon this special case by the respondents. I cannot come to the conclusion, upon the facts stated, that the London County Council would have been willing, as a matter of law, on the 7th of September, 1894, to have given other than a nominal rent; and I therefore disagree with the Divisional Court, which held that the rateable value of Brockwell Park, upon the facts stated must have been, as a matter of law, something in excess of nil; and I would point out that it is only with a question of law arising out of facts that either the Divisional Court or this court has jurisdiction to deal. I may perhaps add that, upon the facts as stated, I am not at all surprised that the respondents have been unable to obtain a finding as in the Erith case and the other cases above mentioned.

A subsidiary point was taken by the respondents that certain parts of the park—for instance, that part of the old mansion-house which is used for refreshments for the public, and the other part of the old mansion which was not occupied at all, and also the lodge and cottage—were subject matters for separate assessments distinct from the park itself, and had a rateable value of their own. The Divisional Court held that this was not so, and I agree with them. The obligation imposed upon the London County Council by the Act of 1890 was to lay out, maintain, and preserve Brockwell Park, and every part of it, as a park for the perpetual use thereof by the public for exercise and recreation. As before stated, the London County Council could let off no part of it. The Legislature enacted that if the London County Council purchased Brockwell Park they should take it as a whole, and for ever maintain it as a whole, and that the whole should be used for a public purpose for ever. This being so, in my judgment it must be rated as a whole, as one entity, and in one assessment; and consequently this small point will not avail the respondents.

This appeal must therefore, for the reasons above, be allowed, with costs.

RIGBY, L.J.—Ever since the passing of the Statute of Elizabeth the measure of rateability of an occupier in respect of property has been the value of the property for occupation. This may be said to be the fundamental principle of the Act. The Parochial Assessment Act, which differs in no material respect from the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, points out with precision how the proper figure is to be ascertained. The assessment is to be on the net annual value. But net annual value is explained to be the excess (if any) over expenditure necessary to command the rent, of the rent which might reasonably be expected to be obtained from year to year from a tenant subject to usual tenant's rates and taxes, and commutation rent-charge, if any. The inquiries therefore always are, first, what rent might reasonably be expected to be obtained; secondly, what average expenditure would be required to command that rent; and if the sum ascertained in answer to the first inquiry is either nothing at all or not in excess of the amount of expenditure shown by the answer to the second inquiry, the property has no rateable value. The rent which might reasonably be expected is to be ascertained by taking into consideration every person to whom the property can have an occupation value, including the owner himself if the property would have to him a special occupation value. Of course, from the nature of the case, the owner cannot be tenant; but for the purpose of ascertaining the net annual value or rent it is clear on the decided cases that he must be treated as a possible tenant for the purpose of calculation only. What I have called the fundamental principle of the Act is clearly pointed out, and made the foundation of the judgment in the Mersey Dock case. In that case also it is laid down that it is not value in the sense of advantage to the public which has to be taken into account, but value to the occupier. In the London School Board case, the Owen's College case, the Burton case, and the Erith case, and other cases dealt with by the House of Lords at the same time with the Erith case, there was no doubt that the school buildings, the college buildings, and the sewage works were of annual value to the occupying owner. In each case the owners, if they had not already acquired the property in respect of which they were sought to be rated, would have had to acquire other property at a great expense, and the net annual value to them of the property actually acquired was not less than the rent (less proper outgoings) which it would have been worth their while to pay for the property if they had not been owners. In each case, also, the property, by reason of its special adaptability for the purposes of the occupying owner, was obviously of greater value to the occupying owner than to anyone else, and the question really was whether that greater value was to be taken into account in fixing the hypothetical rent which, according to the Parochial Assessment Act, was to govern the measure of rateability. No such question arises in the present case. It is admitted that if the land in question were or could be of any net annual value to the London County Council or to anyone else as occupiers, that value must be taken into account. But it is denied that the land is of any net annual value for occupation either to the London County Council or to anyone else. In the existing state of the statute law as to this particular property that is clearly made out, since no conceivable income which could be obtained from the property so long as it remains devoted to the public use as a park can exceed the necessary outgoings for its maintenance which the Act of Parliament imposes. It cannot even be said that the possession of the park relieves the County Council from expenditure which it would have otherwise to incur, since they are under no duty to provide a park for the public use, and no power, even if they had the wish, to do so. The advantage to the public of having the land kept as a park cannot be taken into account. It has, however, been argued that, although by statute the land is devoted in perpetuity as a park for the recreation of the public, it ought for the purpose of ascertaining its annual value to be treated as though it were not so devoted; and it is said truly that on this assumption it would have an undoubted and considerable annual value to an occupier. Another way of stating the argument is that, in ascertaining the value of land for rating purposes, regard should be had only to unproductiveness arising from natural causes, and not from legal restrictions. This argument appears equally opposed to principle and authority. It is the real net annual value which is always to be the foundation of the assessment. The real net annual value to an occupying owner has, as above appears, to be arrived at by supposing a tenancy, which cannot at law exist, for the purpose of fixing the hypothetical rent which by statute is made the measure of net annual value. But the supposition of a tenancy is only for the purpose of calculation, and it is the real net annual value to the occupying owner which is arrived at. The argument now being dealt with attributes to the property a fictitious annual value, having no relation whatever to its real annual value. There is nothing in the Statute of Elizabeth, or in any decided case, to justify this. Authority as well as principle is opposed to it. The Putney Bridge case, for instance, seems to be very closely in point. But it is not necessary to go through earlier authorities, since in the Erith case, which is supposed I know not why to lend some plausibility to the argument, Lord Herschell (in a judgment adopted by all the noble and learned lords) says, at page 591: "Now, if land is 'struck with sterility in any and everybody's hands,' whether by law or by its inherent condition, so that its occupation is and would be of no value to anyone, I should quite agree that it cannot be rated to the poor"; and other words to a similar effect are contained elsewhere in the judgment. It has been suggested that part of the property might be separately rated, but the answer to this is that no part can be separated in use from the rest without breach of the statutory provisions, and therefore the whole must be taken together for the purpose of assessment.

PUGH v. LONDON, BRIGHTON, AND SOUTH COAST RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Insurance—Accident—"Incapacitated from employment by reason of accident"—Nervous shock through fright.

By a policy of insurance the defendants undertook to pay to the plaintiff, who was a signalman in their employment, the sum of £1 a week "in case of his being incapacitated from employment by reason of accident sustained in discharge of his duty in the company's service," the insurance to be "absolute for all accidents however caused to the insured in the fair and ordinary discharge of his duty." While the plaintiff was on duty in his signal-box he saw an express train approaching with sparks and dust flying from it, one of the carriages having broken down. The plaintiff waved a flag to stop the train, and was so excited and terrified that an accident would happen to the train that he received a nervous shock to his system and became incapacitated from employment.

Held, that this was an "accident sustained" by the plaintiff in the discharge of his duty within the meaning of the policy, and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

Application by the defendants for judgment or a new trial in an action, tried before Cave, J., and a special jury, upon a policy of insurance against accident.

The plaintiff was a signalman in the employment of the defendants, and by the policy the defendants agreed, subject to the conditions endorsed thereon, to pay to the plaintiff's representatives the sum of £200 in case of his death from accident occurring in the discharge of his duty in the company's service, and to pay to the plaintiff the weekly allowance specified in the endorsement thereon "in case of his being incapacitated from employment by reason of accident sustained in discharge of his duty in the company's service."

The weekly allowance, in case of permanent disability proved by medical certificate, was to be £1 a week until the amount paid equalled what would have been payable in case of death, and £1 a week in case of temporary disablement for a period not exceeding fifty-two weeks.

By one of the conditions endorsed on the policy, "the insurance is absolute for all accidents however caused to the insured in the fair and ordinary discharge of his duty."

It appeared that while the plaintiff was on duty in his signal-box he saw an express train approaching at considerable speed, and dust and sparks flying from it, the wheel of the Pullman car bogie having broken, and the carriage having a tilt and projecting beyond the rest of the train.

The plaintiff thereupon waved a red flag to stop the train, and the train was brought to a standstill.

The plaintiff was so excited and so terrified that an accident would happen to the train that he received a nervous shock to his system, and was incapacitated from any employment.

He thereupon brought this action to recover £52, being the weekly allowance of £1 for fifty-two weeks, contending that he had sustained an "accident" within the meaning of the policy.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, and judgment was given accordingly.

Bucknill, Q.C., and Hammond Chambers, for the defendants.—There was no "accident sustained" by the plaintiff within the meaning of the policy. There was only an accident to the train. The mere sight of something which he did not expect to see is not an "accident" within the meaning of the policy. There must be impact or something equivalent to impact. A mere shock to the nerves would be an injury, but not an accident, to the plaintiff. Victorian Railways Commissioners v. Coultas, 13 App. Cas. 222, 36 W. R. Dig. 64; Sneesby v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co., 24 W. R. 99, 1 Q. B. D. 42, were referred to.

Spencer Bower, for the plaintiff, was stopped.

Hammond Chambers replied.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the liability of the defendants depends, not upon negligence, but upon contract. The question is whether the defendants are not contractually liable. It is therefore unnecessary to say anything about the case of Victorian Railways Commissioners v. Coultas. We must first see what are the facts to which we have to apply the contract. The plaintiff was a signalman in the employment of the defendants, and at the time of the occurrence in question he was on duty in his signal-box. While he was there he saw a train approaching at great speed, accompanied by a volume of dust and sparks, which showed that there was something wrong with it. Can anyone doubt that that train was in a dangerous condition? He was bound to act promptly. If he allowed the train to proceed, a fearful accident might happen. The responsibility thrown upon the plaintiff was very great, as the safety of the train depended upon his action. If a man is called upon to act under these circumstances, a condition of great excitement will be produced. The immediate result was a shock to his nerves. He was from that time incapacitated from any employment. He was incapacitated by nervous prostration which prevented him from physically doing work. That is a physical disease to the nerves caused by fright arising from the state of the train and the feeling that upon his action the lives of the passengers depended. It was an accidental fright which so prostrated his nervous system, that is, the physical condition of his body, that it incapacitated him from employment. The case therefore came within the policy, and the application must be dismissed.

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It cannot be denied that what occurred to the plaintiff occurred in the discharge of his duty. He saw the express train approaching, and sparks and dust issuing from part of it which showed that a calamity might ensue. He was in his signal-box, and was called upon to act. He had to determine what to do in a moment, and he waved his red flag to stop the train. He acted in the discharge of an imperative duty to prevent an accident to the train, which seemed to be imminent. He succeeded in stopping the train, but received such a shock to his nervous system through fear of the disaster which he thought might happen that he has been incapacitated from employment ever since. The only question argued was whether that incapacity was brought about by reason of accident sustained by the plaintiff in the discharge of his duty, or, to take the words in the condition indorsed on the policy, by an accident caused to the plaintiff in the fair and ordinary discharge of his duty. The argument was brought down to this. It was admitted that if the train had struck the plaintiff, or the boiler of the engine had exploded, and the impact of the air had struck him so as to produce physical injury, in either case there would be an accident within the policy. But it was said that because the plaintiff was not touched by the train or injured by the impact of the air caused by the engine, but was only injured by the shock to his nerves caused by fear of an accident, and the responsibility thrown upon him, there was no liability. I confess that I am unable to follow that argument. It seems to me as much an accident as if he had been struck by the train. Supposing the plaintiff had been in the four-foot way, and he saw a train coming suddenly upon him, and in escaping out of its way he received such a shock to his nervous system that he became incapacitated from work or died, would not that come within the policy? In my opinion the plaintiff is entitled to recover.

CREMER v. LOWLES.

Re HAGGERSTON ELECTION PETITION. (a.)

Parliament — Election petition — Corrupt and illegal practices—Particulars of charges—Offences committed after the date of petition.

In an election petition alleging certain specific offences and "other corrupt and illegal practices before, during, and after the election," the petitioner cannot, unless the petition be duly amended, include in his particulars, or give evidence of, offences alleged to have been committed subsequent to the date of the presentation of the petition.

Appeal from chambers.

This was an appeal by the petitioner from an order made by Lawrance, J., at chambers, striking out certain particulars of charges contained in an election petition.

The petitioner and the respondent were the candidates at a Parliamentary election for the Haggerston Division of the Borough of Shoreditch, which took place on the 16th of July, 1895; the respondent being elected. On the 7th of August the petitioner presented a petition against the respondent's return, alleging that he, by himself or his agents, had been guilty of bribery, treating, undue influence, and other specified offences, and further alleging in another paragraph that he had committed "other corrupt and illegal practices before, during, and after the said election."

On the 14th of August the respondent took out a summons for particulars of the specific charges and of the other charges, and Day, J., on the 16th, made an order that the petitioner should give particulars of the specific charges ten days before the day fixed for the hearing of the petition, and that he should give particulars of the general charges within seven days from the date of the order. On the 19th the respondent filed a return of his election expenses. On the 23rd the petitioner delivered his particulars of the general charges. These particulars included allegations that the respondent had been guilty of illegal practices in connection with the return and declarations in respect of his election expenses.

On the 22nd of October the respondent took out a summons for further and better particulars of the general charges, and on the 25th Pollock, B., made an order for the delivery of such further and better particulars ten days before the day fixed for the hearing of the election petition.

On the 15th of January, 1896, the petitioner delivered full particulars. On the 22nd the respondent applied at chambers to strike out certain of these particulars, namely, particulars 105-158, which related to the alleged illegal practices in connection with the return of his election expenses, and particulars 101 and 103, which related to matters which occurred before the petition was presented. Lawrance, J., made an order that these particulars should be struck out on the ground that the petition did not cover them. The petitioner now appealed.

Willis, Q.C., and B. S. Foster, for the appellant.

Jelf, Q.C., and Lewis Coward, for the respondent.

Lord HALSBURY, C.—I am of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed. This case divides itself into two parts, one a question of law as regards particulars 105-158 and the other as regards particulars 101 and 103. As to the latter part we hesitate either to alter, to affirm, or to overrule the decision of the judge, as we are of opinion that the point was not really argued in chambers. We have jurisdiction to entertain the appeal on that point, but think that it would be more satisfactory to send the matter back to the learned judge for further argument on that point. Our judgment has therefore no reference to that part of the case.

The question we have to determine arises on the objection that the illegal practices alleged in connection with the return of the election expenses are not covered by the petition. The language of the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 51), upon which statute the petitioner relies, is "corrupt practices before, during, or after the election," and he especially relies on the word "after." The point of departure to be looked at is the election or return, twenty-one days from which is the time within which a petition must be presented.

The charges of which particulars may be ordered are charges made by the petition, and they must be charged in respect of offences already committed at the date of the petition. It is impossible that charges founded on offences alleged to have been committed since the presentation of the petition can be held to be charges contained in the petition.

The very language made use of in the petition is of the past tense where it says the respondent "has been" guilty of certain offences, and therefore it cannot possibly include offences not then committed. It is clear that the argument of the petitioner is untenable when one looks at the provision in the statute as to the limit of twenty-one days for the presentation of the petition; for if his contention were right, and the trial of the petition did not take place for some months after its presentation, a member might be unseated for an offence committed months after the election. I am therefore of opinion that the respondent cannot be proceeded against by this petition in respect of charges which did not arise until after the date of the petition. It is said that, in that case, offences committed after the presentation of the petition will go unpunished; but that is not correct. By section 40 of 46 & 47 Vict. c. 51, a member may be charged with such an offence either by amendment of the petition made within the time limited for amendment, or by a fresh petition filed within the prescribed time after the offence was committed. I am therefore of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. As to the question of the objection by the respondents that the particulars 105-158 relate to matters which are not covered by the charges in the petition, but to matters which in fact occurred after the date of the petition, I think that the very statement of the objection is of itself sufficient to show that those particulars were rightly struck out. A petition must be in respect of charges then existent, and the petitioner is only entitled to give particulars of those offences alleged in the petition. If such particulars as were given in this case were allowed, the petition would become prophetic. I do not think the contention of the petitioner gives sufficient effect to the words "before, during, and after the election"; it rather treats the word "election" as though it were "petition." Offences may have occurred between the date of the election and the date of the petition, and it is quite right that such matters should be included in the petition. Offences, however, which are alleged to have been committed after the date of the petition are on quite a different footing. There is no hardship in our decision, for the petitioner might have made these offences the subject of an amended or new petition, had he done so within the time limit prescribed for those steps.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. As to the particulars 105-158, by no conceivable process of reasoning can things which have occurred after the date of the petition be made to fall within an allegation as to things which have previously occurred. I think that that consideration really at once decides the whole matter. In his petition the petitioner must confine himself to things which have occurred before, during, and after the election, and particulars can only be given of matters which had occurred at the date of the petition; he cannot give particulars of something which had not occured at that date. It has been contended on the part of the petitioner that the respondent waived this objection by taking out a summons for further and better particulars. No waiver, however, nor agreement even, could possibly make particulars of things which had not happened at the date of the petition into particulars of things which had happened at such date. The appeal therefore fails, and must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

In re HEMP, YARN, AND CORDAGE CO. (LIMITED). HINDLEY'S CASE. (a.)

Company—Winding up—Underwriting contract—Contributories — Register of members — Expiration of agent's authority to apply for shares—Ratification of application by subsequent conduct of principal.

An underwriting letter containing an offer by the underwriter, in consideration of a premium, to take up such shares in a company as should not be taken up by the public in answer to an invitation for public subscription, and also the statement that "this engagement is binding on me for two months from this date," was addressed to the promoters of the company. The capital was offered to the public a few days after the date of the underwriting letter, but the underwriting letter was not accepted until a date at which the subscription list had been closed, the invitation to the public proving an almost total failure. The promoters applied for shares in the underwriter's name, and the shares were allotted to him and his name was placed on the register of members of the company, where it remained for more than three years, he acting all that time as a shareholder.

Held, that, whether or not the application for shares was properly made on behalf of the underwriter and accepted in due time, he had by his conduct ratified what had been done, and was liable to pay calls made in the winding up of the company.

Astbury, Q.C., and E. C. Macnaghten, for the respondent.—The letter was only an offer, and should have been accepted within a reasonable time. Astbury, Q.C., replied on the further cases cited.

LINDLEY, L.J., stated the facts, read the letter, and continued:—That was an offer, and an offer only. Although it begins "I agree" and talks about the engagement being binding, there was nothing binding upon anybody until it was accepted. Mr. Hindley says that, when you look at this letter, which he signed, upon the true construction of it, it involves the necessity of acceptance by the corporation within a reasonable time after its date, and he says that it was in fact accepted by the corporation on the 1st of July, 1892, which was an unreasonably long time after they had received his offer, and the directors knew that this was the case. He wants us to say upon that that there was no authority to put his name on the register, and that as there never was any agreement at all his name has been there improperly ever since. He says that, the transaction having been void altogether, the mere fact that he received the certificate and acted as a shareholder goes for nothing. Vaughan Williams, J., held that Mr. Hindley was right, and that the document really means that this is not to come into force unless the offer is accepted within a reasonable time, and as it was accepted after the 22nd of June, which was the time for sending in applications for shares, and as Mr. Hindley did not know that, there never was any agreement by him to take shares. We have received some evidence which was not before the learned judge. I mean that on the 23rd of January, 1893, Mr. Hindley applied for and received certificates that he was a member of the company in respect of those shares, and that in May, 1894, he signed some proxy papers; so that we have thus evidence, in addition to that which was before Vaughan Williams, J., that this gentleman, knowing that an allotment of shares had been made to him, and that he had been placed on the register, allowed his name to remain there, and acted as a shareholder from July, 1892, down nearly to the end of the existence of this company. On the true construction of the agreement I do not propose to say much. It is worded in such a way that the true construction is open to a great deal of doubt. I have already stated the construction which has been adopted by Vaughan Williams, J., as the true construction. Mr. Buckley asks us to say that the words, "this engagement shall be binding on me for two months," mean "this offer is open for two months for acceptance or rejection," and that the clause means in substance that this proposal or offer shall be binding for two months; in other words, the clause applies to the time for accepting the whole offer, and not to the engagement or agreement which will become binding when the whole offer is accepted. I thought at first that Mr. Buckley's contention was right, but I do not feel confident of that at all. I am not prepared to say that Vaughan Williams, J.,

is wrong; and, indeed, when all the consequences are pointed out I am disposed to think that Vaughan Williams, J., is right, and that what is meant is this: the limit of two months will be part of the agreement which will be constituted by acceptance. It is a very doubtful question, and I rather understand that my learned brothers do not agree with me upon it. But I will assume that the learned judge is right there. It appears to me it does not follow by a long way that Mr. Hindley's name ought to be struck off the list of contributories. It would stand thus. He signed an authority to put him on the register, and that authority was so worded that he might have been put on properly or improperly, whether properly or improperly depending on an event not specified to him. When he first knew that his name was on the register he did not take any steps to have it removed. He knew that he was there in pursuance of an authority which might have been exercised improperly. He knows that, and does not take the slightest care to inquire how it was done; not a bit. He remains on the register from 1892 till now, and now he says there was no authority to put him on. I cannot conceive that that is sound on any principle of law or equity or fair play. To put it at the highest, even if he says that he has become a shareholder by some trick or some unfair use of his authority, how can a man be allowed to complain of that when the company is being wound up? It seems to me inconsistent with the whole reasoning in Oakes v. Turquand, and other cases which have followed that, and entirely contrary to the principles on which those cases have been decided. With respect to the next case which Mr. Astbury pressed on us—Beck's case—the ratio decidendi was this. After the agreement for the amalgamation of the two companies was entered into, Beck applied for shares half paid up, and the general manager wrote that he should have shares on which a different amount was paid up. He was accordingly put on the register, a thing which there was no authority from him to do, and then it was argued that because after that he had written asking for the certificates he had ratified what had been done. But it was held there that he was in time to take steps to get his name off the register, because when the unfortunate company was wound up he was not a shareholder.

Assuming, therefore, that Vaughan Williams, J.'s, construction of this document is right, it appears to me that the learned judge has gone wrong in the conclusions he has drawn from the facts as found by him. This is not an application to take Hintley's name off the list; it is an application to enforce payment of calls. I think this is as plain a case for keeping this gentleman's name on the list as ever came before the courts. Whatever is the true construction of the documents, I do not find the slightest difficulty at all in saying I think the decision of the learned judge is erroneous. No doubt their form might be improved. They are framed in such a way as is calculated to produce disputes. The appeal must be allowed.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The learned judge in the court below has held that Mr. Hindley is not a shareholder, and has directed that he should be struck off the list of contributories. I am unable to agree with the decision of the learned judge. Hindley signed an underwriting letter in the form which has been read by Lindley, L.J.; and no doubt a good deal depends on the true construction of that letter. I am far from saying that it is perfectly clear. I am far from saying that it may not bear the construction which was put upon it by Vaughan Williams, J., and which, I think, was rather favoured by Lindley, L.J. If I had to consider the meaning of that document, I think I should not put that construction upon it. It has been argued, and most ingeniously, that "this engagement" means: "This offer when consummated by acceptance, which must be within a reasonable time, shall be binding on me for two months." I cannot read that into the agreement. I think it means this: "This offer shall be binding on me for two months and no longer; this offer is to be open for two months." I venture to think that it is rather to force the words to put another construction upon it.

If that is the true construction of this letter this case is at an end, and Mr. Hindley must be a shareholder. But, even assuming that the true construction is what Vaughan Williams, J., thought it was, I entirely agree with what has been said by Lindley, L.J., as to what has happened since. It seems to me impossible, having regard to the conduct of this matter, to the time which has elapsed, his acting as shareholder, his voting by proxy, and for what I know other things which have happened—it seems to me impossible to come to any other conclusion than that Mr. Hindley is properly on the list of contributories. I think, therefore, that the decision of the learned judge below is wrong, and that the appeal must be allowed.

KAY, L.J., stated the nature of the application, and continued:—It seems to me that Mr. Hindley is very ill-advised if he attempts to defend this application for calls made in the winding up of the company by saying, "I am not a shareholder." If he said, "I have been induced to take shares by fraud, or by some trick or improper dealing on the part of people whom I constituted my agents. Those agents exceeded their authority." All that might be a very good ground, before the winding up began, for taking his name off the list of contributories. But as long as Oakes v. Turquand is law none of those grounds is a reason, after the winding up begins, for removing the name of a contributory. Mr. Hindley signed an underwriting agreement. I confess I have a very clear opinion of my own what that document means. It begins as though it were an agreement, but I think it is a mere offer by the signer of that letter. [His lordship read part of the letter, and continued:—] What "engagement" was there when he signed that letter? The engagement was the offer he made on certain terms to underwrite the shares which the public did not take, that is, as things turned out, to take most of the shares of the company; and the offer contains an authority to the persons to whom it was written, and who, I suppose, were promoters of the company, to apply for shares in his name.

But it seems to me not to matter a farthing whether it means that or what the learned judge understood it to mean. Construe the words in this way: "If this offer shall be accepted within a reasonable time, then the agreement which is completed by that acceptance shall be in force against me for a period of two months." I will only say that it seems to me quite impossible to put that meaning on those words. It would be an extraordinary alteration, it seems to me, of very simple words. But suppose that construction were right, suppose the meaning which the learned judge put on the words was the true meaning, then there is no time whatever fixed for acceptance. Therefore, here is an authority to agents to apply for shares in the name of this Mr. Hindley, and for the directors of the company, with whom he was not contracting, to accept that application and put him on the register as a shareholder, and there is no limit of time for making the application. The result of the construction adopted by the learned judge is that the only limit is a reasonable time. I try to put the document against the view I am inclined to take in the strongest way I can. It is said by the respondent's counsel that the prospectus then about to be issued means that shares will be offered on the 20th, 21st, and 22nd of June, 1892, and that no shares will be offered after that date; and therefore it is said that the reasonable time within which this offer must be accepted must be before the 22nd of June, because when the 22nd of June had arrived it would be known whether the public had or had not subscribed for the shares offered for subscription. The risk intended to be run would then have been run, and the case was likened to a bet upon a race, which if the race had actually taken place would be completely off. But the suggested analogy is not an analogy at all. The shares are to be offered to the public between the 20th and the 22nd of June, which would be in a few days after Hindley made his offer. He does not say on the face of it, "You shall accept or reject the offer before the 22nd of June." There is no limit of time at all, unless I am right in saying that the limit is two months. No communication was made to him by way of answer or acceptance till the 1st of July, some time after the public had been invited to take shares, and had not responded except by taking a very few indeed. Mr. Hindley says he then for the first time got an intimation that he was to be on the list of shareholders. He accepted that, made no inquiry, applied for a certificate, sent in a proxy to vote on several occasions, waited four years, and now, having obtained inspection, he says, "I find endorsed on the offer a statement that it was accepted on the 1st of July. I say there was no acceptance till the 1st of July." There, I think, Mr. Hamilton's argument is a good one. Hindley knew on the 1st of July that there was no communication of any acceptance till that date, and he might have gathered that there was no previous acceptance. He made no inquiry. He did not say, "The risk has been run, I know what the public are going to do, and it is now too late." Hindley accepted the shares, paid money upon them, and acted as a shareholder for four years; and then he sent, I have no doubt some extremely clever solicitor to investigate the matter, and the solicitor says, "Now I think I have found a way to get you out of this difficulty, and bring this fact before the courts as a defence." In my judgment this defence is absolutely preposterous, although the learned judge has come to a different conclusion. With the utmost deference to the learned judge, I say that in such circumstances a shareholder is not entitled to be removed from the list of contributories, and indeed any other decision opens up prospects of considerable alarm.

I think, with great deference, that the decision of the learned judge was entirely wrong, and ought to be reversed, with costs here and below.

Will—Construction—Absolute gift—Legacies out of proceeds of sale—Repugnancy.

T. E., by his will, appointed the plaintiff, M. A. K., his sole executrix, and gave her all his tea plantations in Assam and all other his property, and continued: "On any sale by the said M. A. K. of the said tea plantations I will and direct her to pay my brother, J. E., the sum of £1,000 out of the proceeds of such sale. Also the further sum of £500 out of the proceeds of such sale to I. B," who was the testator's sister.

Held, that no obligation was imposed on the plaintiff to sell the plantations, and that the direction to pay the sums of £1,000 and £500 was repugnant and void.

Summons.

The above-named testator, who died in England in June, 1893, by his will, made in April, 1893, gave all his plantations in Assam and all other his property, estate, and interest, whatsoever and wheresoever, to the plaintiff absolutely, subject to the payment of his debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and, after appointing her executrix, continued: "On any sale" by her "of the tea plantations, I will and direct her to pay my brother John Elliot the sum of £1,000 out of the proceeds of such sale, also the further sum of £500 out of the proceeds of such sale to" the testator's sister.

The plantations, according to the law of Assam, were personal estate and vested in the legal personal representative, and at the death of the testator they constituted nearly the whole of his estate.

The questions were whether there was any implied trust or direction to sell the plantations and to pay out of the proceeds the sums of £1,000 and £500 to the testator's brother and sister, and, if not, as to the validity of the direction to pay.

CHITTY, J.—The will contains no express trust or direction to sell the Assam tea plantations. The first and more important question is whether on the true construction of the will there is any implied trust or direction to sell; or, in other words, whether any obligation is imposed on the plaintiff to sell the plantations, and to pay out of the proceeds the sums of £1,000 and £500 to the testator's brother and sister. The plantations, according to the law of Assam, are personal estate, and vest in the legal personal representative. When the testator made his will and at his death the plantation constituted nearly the whole of his estate. His debts and funeral expenses amounted to rather less than £2,500. Among the debts was a sum of £718 owing to the agents who managed the plantations, and for which the agents had a lien on the produce. Another debt was a sum of £1,500 owing to the testator's brother, John Elliot; this debt, however, had no relation to the sums amounting to £1,500 mentioned in his will. The debts other than the £718 have all been paid by the plaintiff, as executrix. For the purpose of paying them she has raised money by mortgage of the plantations. She has also raised money in like manner for her own purposes. Neither side has thought fit to adduce any evidence as to the value of the plantations.

By his will the testator gave the plantations and all other his estate to the plaintiff. Thus far the plaintiff is universal legatee, and, subject to payment of the testator's debts and his funeral and testamentary expenses, she is absolutely entitled to the plantations for her own benefit. The testator then proceeded to appoint her executrix, and continued thus: [His lordship here read the clause set out above.] Taking the words as they stand, they do not import any obligation to sell; they leave it to the plaintiff to sell or not to sell as she may think fit. The words are peculiar. The sale referred to is a sale by her, and apparently a sale by any person claiming under her is not within the clause. On a just construction of the testator's language I can find no sufficient ground for holding that the term "sale" means anything but a sale in the ordinary sense of the term. Consistently with the language used, she could mortgage the plantations, let them, settle them, and give them by instrument inter vivos or by will, free from any claim on the part of the testator's brother or sister. I think he meant neither more nor less than just what he said: if she thought fit to sell, she was to pay the two sums to his brother and sister.

To hold otherwise would, in my opinion, be acting on conjecture only, and would be making a will for the testator, and a will which he did not intend to make. Had he intended to give these sums to his brother and sister in any event, it would have been so simple for him to give the legacies to them and the residue of his property to the plaintiff. A testator of the humblest capacity knows how to give a pecuniary legacy. Further, if he meant to impose on the plaintiff the obligation of selling, within what time did he mean that she should sell? There is no indication of any sort that she is to sell at the expiration of a year or at any other time during her life. No interest is given on the sums which are to be paid out of the proceeds. This shows that he meant her to sell, if at all, when she thought fit. The result, in my opinion, is that no obligation is imposed on the plaintiff to sell, and that the testator's intention was simply that the sums should be paid, and should only be paid, out of the proceeds if and when she thought fit to make a sale.

The other question is whether the clause, as thus interpreted, is valid. The question is one of comparatively little importance, because it seems quite clear that the plaintiff will not sell the plantations if on a sale she has to pay the £1,500. But the question having been raised it is right to decide it. It appears to me that the testator has attempted to create a new kind of estate unknown to the law. The owner of property has, as an incident of his ownership, the right to sell and to receive the whole of the proceeds for his own benefit. But this testator says that if the owner sells, a part only of the proceeds shall belong to her, and the residue shall go to other persons. This direction is, I think, repugnant and void. My opinion is based on the broad general principle of law. The case does not fall within any of the exceptions which have been allowed—such, for instance, as those discussed and admitted by Sir G. Jessel in Re Macleay.

CHITTY, J.—The case arises out of the frauds of William Edward Cartwright, a solicitor of Newcastle-under-Lyme, and the question is which of the persons affected by his frauds are to suffer. The persons affected are, first, the plaintiffs, Lloyds Bank; secondly, the defendants, a building society; and thirdly, the defendant Newbrook, trustee under the will of Hood, former owner of the property, and the persons beneficially interested under the trusts of that will. One of these beneficiaries was added as a defendant at the trial. The transactions took place in December, 1892. At that time Cartwright was in good repute and esteemed to be a man of wealth. In August, 1893, he was adjudicated bankrupt, and he was subsequently convicted of fraud, and is now undergoing sentence.

At Hood's death, which occurred in October, 1892, the property was subject to a mortgage made by him to the building society, by virtue of which the legal estate in fee passed to them. The property was worth about £700. He devised his equity of redemption to the defendant Newbrook, upon trust for sale. Cartwright was the solicitor for the building society, and also for Hood, and after his death for Newbrook as trustee.

Having falsely and fraudulently represented to the society that notice to pay off the mortgage had been given, Cartwright procured the necessary statutory receipt in the prescribed form to be endorsed upon the mortgage deed, pursuant to the 42nd section of the Act of 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 42). The receipt was dated December, 1892, the day of the month being left in blank to be filled in when the deed and receipt were exchanged for the money due. The statutory receipt was unquestionably executed merely as an escrow to be delivered over by Cartwright on redemption. Cartwright obtained possession of the deed thus endorsed, and had authority to receive the money on redemption; but he had no authority to part with the deed except upon payment of the money. The amount due was £172 11s. 9d. The society never received the money either from Cartwright or anyone else. The person entitled to redeem was Newbrook, as trustee of Hood's will. He did not pay the money or any part of it. Cartwright never received the money from any person. In fact, he never parted with the deed until after his bankruptcy, when his son handed the deed to Newbrook.

Between Newbrook and the building society there is no question. Counsel for Newbrook and the beneficiaries admit, and rightly, that the society has priority over Newbrook and the beneficiaries under Hood's will.

The plaintiffs, however, claim priority over the society. Their claim is merely equitable. On the 29th of December, 1892, or a day or so later, Cartwright obtained an advance of £650 from the plaintiffs, and, having possession of the title deeds, deposited with the plaintiffs, as a security for an advance of £650, all the title deeds, except the deed of mortgage to the society, and signed a memorandum of deposit of the usual kind containing an undertaking to execute a mortgage. Among the deeds thus deposited was a deed of conveyance which Cartwright on the 29th of December obtained from Newbrook. The deeds thus deposited apparently showed a good title in Cartwright. The mortgage to the society was not disclosed by the deeds deposited. In fact the bank had no notice of that mortgage or the endorsed receipt; they did not advance their money on the faith of the receipt, and they were not aware of its existence until after the bankruptcy of Cartwright. In these circumstances the plaintiffs claim priority over the society on the ground, first, of estoppel; and, secondly, of admissions made by the society. It is plain that no case of estoppel arises. [In regard to the admissions, his lordship held that the society having made them in error were entitled to recall them and to show the true facts.] The result, as between the plaintiffs and the society, is this—the society have not parted with the legal estate; it still remains vested in them as security, and in respect of this security the society have priority over the plaintiffs. They are entitled to have that mortgage deed delivered over to them.

I have now to consider the questions which arise between the plaintiffs on the one hand and the defendant Newbrook and the beneficiaries on the other. It is contended for the latter that the conveyance of the 29th of December, 1892, is not the deed of Newbrook and that it is utterly void, the facts being sufficient to support a plea of non est factum. The deed was signed, sealed, and delivered by Newbrook at Cartwright's office on the day of its date, and the execution was attested by one of Cartwright's clerks. Newbrook was a letter carrier about twenty-two years of age, able to read, but wholly unversed in business of this kind.

When Newbrook executed the parchment he knew that it related to the property, and to a sale of the property by him to Cartwright for £700. He placed implicit confidence in Cartwright. He did not read the deed. With an exception not material to the question now under consideration, the deed is in the form of an ordinary conveyance by a trustee in execution of a trust for sale. It witnesses that, for effectuating the sale and in consideration of £700 paid by Cartwright to Newbrook at or before the execution of the deed, the receipt whereof Newbrook thereby acknowledged, Newbrook conveyed the property to Cartwright in fee simple. The exception above referred to is that Newbrook conveys as beneficial owner. The purchase money was never in fact paid. The deed was left by Newbrook in Cartwright's hands. On these facts I hold that the deed was not a mere nullity or void, though it may have been voidable as between Newbrook and Cartwright. This part of the case is covered by the decisions of the Court of Appeal in Hunter v. Walters and National Provincial Bank v. Jackson.

There remains the question, Which have the better equity, the plaintiff or Newbrook and his cestuis que trustent? The plaintiffs took their equitable security on the faith of Newbrook's conveyance. They had no notice that the purchase money had not been paid, nor had they any ground for suspecting that Cartwright, when he deposited that conveyance, had committed or was committing any fraud on Newbrook or the beneficiaries. The plaintiffs were entitled to rely on the receipt given by Newbrook in the body of the deed. The necessity for an indorsed receipt has been abolished by the Conveyancing Act, 1881, ss. 54 and 55. By section 54, sub-section 1, a receipt for consideration money in the body of the deed is a sufficient discharge for the same to the person paying the same without any further receipt being indorsed on the deed. By section 55, sub-section 1, a receipt for consideration money in the body of the deed is, in favour of a subsequent purchaser not having notice that the money has not in fact been paid, sufficient evidence of the payment. "Purchaser" includes an equitable mortgagee (section 2, viii.). These enactments bring the case within the principle on which Rice v. Rice, Hunter v.

Walters, and Bickerton v. Walker were decided. It was argued for the persons entitled to the purchase money under the trust for sale that they stand in a different position from their trustee; that the plaintiffs claim through a breach of trust on his part; and that their equity, which is prior in point of time, is not displaced. In support of this argument the decision of the House of Lords in The Shropshire Union Railways and Canal v. Reg. was relied on. But that case is distinguishable; as between himself and the equitable owner the trustees there had no authority whatever to deal with the trust property. Here the testator, the author of the trust, has confided to Newbrook authority to sell the property and to give a receipt for the purchase money. Newbrook was acting within the scope of his authority. The essential part of the breach of trust was the giving of the receipt without in fact receiving the purchase money. The circumstances appear to me to bring the case within the range of the authority of Perry-Herrick v. Atwood recently approved of by the House of Lords in Brocklesby v. The Temperance Building Society. For the purpose now under consideration I am unable to see any material distinction between agency and trust. Further, Lord Romilly's decision in Worthington v. German, substantially covers the present case, and is in favour of the plaintiffs. A judgment for the beneficiaries in the circumstances of this case would be disastrous to titles; it would compel purchasers where the legal estate is outstanding in a mortgagee to inquire whether purchase money under a trust for sale had in fact been paid, notwithstanding that the trustee had acknowledged the recipt; and it would cast this burden on them in the teeth of the 55th section of the Conveyancing Act, which relieves them from making any such inquiry. For these reasons I hold that the plaintiffs have priority over the defendant Newbrook and his cestuis que trustent.

Power—Power of jointuring—Jointure, Meaning of—Power to appoint portions—Benefit to appointor.

A jointure is a provision for a wife after the death of her husband, and, except under special circumstances, the court will not give effect to an appointment under a power of jointuring which is to take effect during the lifetime of the husband.

Henty v. Wrey, 30 W. R. 850, 21 Ch. D. 332, followed.

Summons.

This case raised two questions. First, as to the meaning of the word jointure, and, secondly, whether a revocable appointment under a power in favour of infant children could be upheld, though the donee of the power, as guardian of the children, took a benefit under the appointment.

The facts were as follow. The testator, Sir Henry De Hoghton, by his will dated the 9th of February, 1875, devised his estates to trustees for a term of 500 years, and subject thereto in strict settlement upon his brothers with remainders over. The trusts of the term were, shortly, to pay annuities to the person who, but for the term, would have been tenant for life under the will and to accumulate the residue for twenty-one years from the date of the testator's death and invest.

The testator died on the 2nd of December, 1876, and consequently the trusts of the term were still in force. Among the testator's brothers was the present baronet, Sir James De Hoghton, who succeeded on the 12th of April, 1893, and on the expiration of the term, on the 2nd of December, 1897, becomes tenant for life under the will. The will also contained a power for any person thereby made tenant for life of the devised estates, either before or after he should become entitled to the rents and profits, to appoint to any wife he might marry a yearly rent-charge not exceeding £1,000 either for her life or for any less period. The exercise of this power was to supersede pro tanto the trust for accumulation. The rent-charge was not expressed to be by way of jointure, but the testator subsequently alluded to the power as a power of jointuring. A further power was also given to each tenant for life to charge portions for his younger children up to £10,000 when there were more than three children, and also to charge the premises with the payment of any annual sum not exceeding 4 per cent. per annum on the sum charged, such annual sum to be applied towards the education and maintenance of the children, to commence at such period and be payable at such times as might be appointed. The exercise of this power also was to supersede pro tanto the trust for accumulation.

Sir James De Hoghton, on his marriage in 1878, charged the estates, in the event, which happened, of his having more than three children, with a jointure of £1,000, and portions of £10,000 payable after his death, and also with the payment after his death of an annual sum, not exceeding 4 per cent. on the expectant portions, for the maintenance and education of his children.

By a supplementary deed, dated the 26th of July, 1895, Sir James De Hoghton purported, in pursuance of the powers of appointment given him by the will, to appoint to his wife during their joint lives a yearly rent-charge of £1,000 payable quarterly, the first instalment to be paid within three calendar months from the date of those presents. He then went on to direct that the estates devised by the will should be charged with an annual sum for the maintenance of the children of 4 per cent. on their expectant portions. This appointment contained a power of revocation.

The present summons was taken out by Sir James De Hoghton, and asked for liberty to make payments in accordance with the terms of the deed.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and Ingle Joyce, in support of the application.—The testator's intention was to enable an appointment to be made during the term. This is simply a power to appoint a rent-charge, and the words "by way of jointure" are omitted. Even if they were not, a jointure need not necessarily commence on the death of the husband: Jamieson v. Trevelyan, 10 Ex. 229, 3 W. R. Dig. 220. As regards the interest on the portions, the power is in such terms that it can be exercised at once.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

They also referred to the Statute of Uses, s. 4; Zouch v. Woolston, 2 Burrows 1,136; Hervey v. Hervey, 1 Atkyns 561; and Davidson's Precedents, vol. 4, p. 347.

Buckley, Q.C., and Rowden, contra.—The fact that the testator has provided annuity for Sir James De Hoghton during the term is against his intending the power of jointuring to take effect immediately. The definition of jointure in Bacon's Abridgment, vol. 2, p. 144, shows that it is a provision to commence on the husband's death, and Jamieson v. Trevelyan only shows that the meaning can be controlled by the context. As to the question of interest on the portions, the court will not, in the case of a direct devise to a child, allow maintenance in the lifetime of a parent: Hughes v. Hughes, 1 Bro. C. C. 387; Andrews v. Partington, 3 Bro. C. C. 60.

They also referred to Simpson on Infants, p. 392.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., replied.

Methold, for the infant children of Sir James De Hoghton, referred to Ashton's case, 2 Dyer 228*a*, in support of the application.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 16.—STIRLING, J., after stating the facts and reading the clauses in the will referring to the power to appoint a rent-charge to the wife said:—The question is whether the appointments under the deed of the 26th of July, 1895, are valid and effect ought to be given to them. The first appointment, that is the appointment of the jointure rent-charge to the present Lady De Hoghton, turns on the construction of the power in the will. That power is in the common form and, with one exception, in the exact form given in Davidson's Precedents. [His lordship then read the power to jointure rent-charge from Davidson, vol. 3, pp. 219, 1054, and continued:—] It only differs from that form by omitting the words "by way of jointure." But subsequently in the will the expression occurs, "the power of jointure may be exercised." It seems to me, therefore, that the power is a power of jointure.

The question is, What effect ought to be given to the word "jointure"? What is jointure? Both popularly and by legal writers it is understood to mean a provision for a wife after the death of her husband. I will refer to some of these writers. [His lordship then read definitions of jointure from Coke, p. 36*b*; Blackstone, vol. 2, p. 137; Bacon's Abridgment, vol. 2, p. 744; Burton's Compendium, p. 125; and Sugden on Powers, p. 484). I take it, therefore, that the primâ facie meaning of jointure is a provision for a wife after the death of her husband. It is not, however, necessarily confined to a provision for a wife to commence on the death of her husband; and, in fact, in Jamieson v. Trevelyan, which was relied on on behalf of the application, a power of jointure was held to take effect during the lifetime of the husband. But that case was a remarkable one. [His lordship then stated the facts of that case from the headnote, and continued:—] Now in the course of the argument in that case, when it was urged that the jointure was to commence on the death of the husband, Pollock, B., says, at page 277: "That construction of the testator's intention is, to say the least of it, a highly improbable one—I may say an impossible one. A person wishing to provide for his son gives him an annuity of £300, with the power of settling it upon his wife, annexing a condition that, in case he should make such an appointment, the new annuity should be in substitution for that given to the son, which annuity is wholly to cease and determine. It would be but a poor substitution for the annuity of which the son is in present enjoyment, if the effect of the arrangement were to deprive him of his annuity. The question, then, is whether, in the face of such an improbable construction, the word jointure necessarily means a provision for a woman after her husband's death." And Alderson, B., says, at page 278: "The term 'jointure' may mean an estate to the wife to commence either before or after the death of her husband. The testator gave his son an annuity; but according to the plaintiff's argument the son, by the power given him, would have less. If the testator had given his son the power to appoint to his wife an estate of £500 a year, payable to her on his death, in substitution of that which he had of £300 a year, payable in præsenti, the argument would be more plausible."

I have quoted these passages from the argument instead of reading the judgments, because these passages appear to me to give the substance of the judgments in that case. The ground for the conclusion in that case appears to me to have been the peculiar language of the will, and Lord St. Leonards, in his book on Powers, in a note to the passage I have read, says: "But the power of substituting a wife as annuitant for her husband who had a present interest for life enables the gift of an immediate interest to the wife, although the power expresses it to be by way of jointure (Jamieson v. Trevelyan), a case too clear for argument." Evidently Lord St. Leonards was of opinion that a jointure meant a provision for a wife to commence on the death of her husband. The question is whether there is anything in the language of this will to give it another meaning. I think that there is not. I think the testator would have been much surprised if he had been told that any such construction could be put on the language of the will. He has provided annuities for the persons who are tenants for life under the will subject to the trust for accumulation, and I do not think that he had any intention of enabling them to supplement these annuities by the exercise of the power to appoint a rent-charge in favour of a wife. I think, therefore, that this exercise of the power, so far as relates to the jointure, cannot be given effect to. The second question relates to the interest on the portions of the children. The power, in this instance, is in the widest possible terms. [His lordship then read the power, and continued:—] The question of the validity of the appointment under the deed of the 26th of July, 1895, depends, first, on its being within the language of the power; secondly, on whether effect ought to be given to it, it being an appointment by the donee of the power in favour of himself, as guardian of his children. I do not overlook the fact that the deed of 1895 is revocable, and that, in all probability, it will be revoked on the determination in 1897 of the trust for accumulation. In coming to the conclusion I have arrived at, I am guided by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Henty v. Wrey. That was not a question of interest, but there the question arose on a power to appoint portions; the principle, however, appears to me to be the same. There the appointment was made without regard to the ordinary practice. That does not apply directly in the present case, but the result seems to me to be the same. [His lordship then read the judgment of Lindley, L.J., in Henty v. Wrey on page 359 of 21 Ch. D.: "The results at which I have arrived . . . without additional evidence the court cannot do so"—and continued:—] I think this principle applies to the present case. First, then, as regards the language of the power, the language seems to me to be unambiguous, and the exercise, in my opinion, falls within the terms of the power. Secondly, as regards the fact that Sir James De Hoghton is being benefited, I think the last principle laid down by Lindley, L.J., applies, and without evidence I cannot regard this exercise of the power as necessarily invalid. It is true that the court will scrutinize such an appointment as the present very closely, but I am informed that Sir James De Hoghton is prepared to supply evidence that the appointment is for the benefit of the children. I am of opinion that this evidence ought to be supplied, and when this is done I think this part of the summons may be acceded to.

Order accordingly.

THE COMMISSIONERS OF POLICE v. CARTMAN. (a.)

Licensing Acts—Sale of drink to drunken person—Sale by barman contrary to orders—Conviction of publican—Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), s. 13.

A publican gave general instructions to his barmen not to sell drink to drunken persons. A barman, in the absence of the publican, sold drink to a drunken person.

Held, that, the act of the barman being within the scope of his employment, the publican was liable to be convicted under section 13 of the Licensing Act, 1872, for selling intoxicating liquor to a drunken person.

Case stated by a metropolitan police magistrate (Mr. Vaughan) sitting at Bow-street.

The respondent, the landlord of the "Coach and Horses" public-house, 323 and 325, Strand, was summoned for that, being a licensed person, he did on the 14th of October, 1895, unlawfully sell intoxicating liquor to a drunken person, contrary to section 13 of the Licensing Act, 1872.

It appeared by the evidence that at 11.45 on the night of the 14th of October a man named Evans, who was undoubtedly drunk, entered the public-house with two women, that a police constable called the attention of the door-porter to the fact that the man was drunk; that the porter went and spoke to the barman, who drew and placed one glass of beer before the drunken man, who took it and paid for it; that the porter took it from his hand and placed it before the barman, who replaced it before Evans, who again took it and drank it up. The police constable then said to the barman, "You could see that he was drunk"; to which the barman replied, "If you saw that he was drunk, why did you not put him out?" The landlord, who was not present, was sent for by the constable, and on making his appearance he inquired of the porter why he had admitted the drunken man, upon which he replied, as the fact was, that he had spoken to the barman twice.

The defendant was called, and stated that at the time of the occurrence he was a considerable distance away, and out of sight of the bar, and that he had given precise instructions to the door-porter and to the barmen to refuse drink to drunken or semi-drunken persons.

Upon this state of facts the magistrate was of opinion that, as the landlord was not present, and was ignorant of the act of his barman, and as there had been no delegation of authority to the barman to supply drink to a drunken person, but on the contrary he had been prohibited from doing so, and as the door-porter, who was equally in charge of the premises with the barman, had exercised his authority in endeavouring to prevent the supply of drink to Evans, he was not guilty of the offence, and he dismissed the summons.

The question which the magistrate submitted to the court was whether he was absolutely bound to convict on the authority of the cases of Cundy v. Le Cocq, 32 W. R. 769, 13 Q. B. D. 207, and Bond v. Evans, 36 W. R. 767, 21 Q. B. D. 249, or whether he was at liberty to take into consideration the above circumstances, as the circumstances were considered in Somerset v. Hart, 32 W. R. 594, 12 Q. B. D. 360.

Section 13 of the Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), provides: "If any licensed person permits drunkenness . . . or sells any intoxicating liquor to a drunken person, he shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding for the first offence ten pounds, and not exceeding for the second and any subsequent offence twenty pounds."

Danckwerts, for the appellants.—The magistrate ought to have convicted the respondent. The act of the barman in selling the drink was an act done by the barman within the scope of his employment and within the scope of his authority. The master is therefore liable for such act in the same way as if he had done it himself. Section 13 contains an absolute prohibition against selling drink to a drunken person, and the case of Candy v. Le Cocq, 32 W. R. 769, 13 Q. B. D. 207, shows that it is immaterial whether the person who sold the drink knew or did not know that the person to whom it was sold was drunk. The prohibition of the section is therefore absolute.

He referred to Bond v. Evans; Reg. v. Stephens, 14 W. R. 859, L. R. 1 Q. B. 702; Sherras v. De Rutzen, 43 W. R. 526, [1895] 1 Q. B. 918; and Crabtree v. Hole, 43 J. P. 799.

He was then stopped.

S. Lynch, for the respondent.—The magistrate was right in the view he took of the section. The barman sold contrary to the express orders given to him by his master, and he was therefore not acting within the scope of his authority. The fact of the sale by the barman merely raises a primâ facie case against the master which he can rebut, and the magistrate has held that he has rebutted the presumption. The case of Newman v. Jones, 17 Q. B. D. 132, 34 W. R. Dig. 105, shows that, as the drink was sold contrary to the orders of the master, the master was not liable. So in Somerset v. Hart it was held that a master is not liable for gaming in his licensed premises where he had no knowledge of the same.

LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—The question here is whether or not the learned magistrate was bound to convict the respondent of selling intoxicating liquor to a drunken person contrary to the 13th section of the Licensing Act of 1872. In considering that question we have to observe what the object of this Act is, and to consider how far its object would be defeated if the construction which the magistrate was inclined to put upon it were to be given to it. The object of the Act is, in the interests of public order, to prevent the sale of intoxicating liquor to drunken persons. The persons from whom alone the drunken persons can get the liquor are licensed persons. From the very way in which the business is carried on the licensed persons must carry it on through others. In some cases the licensee himself may be in the actual control and conduct of the business, but in most cases it is not so. They depute their business beyond a very general supervision to other persons. Are they to be liable for the acts of those other persons? They are, subject to this qualification, that such acts must be within the scope of the servant's employment, and the scope of the authority receives limitation from the scope of the employment. It seems to me that within the scope of the employment authority is given to the employee. Does it make any difference for the purpose of this section that by private instructions the licensee says to the servant, "Do not sell to drunken persons." I do not think it does. I think if that effect were to be given to it, this statute would be entirely defeated. Take the common case of a sporting publican who goes to race meetings all over the country, and leaves behind him a barman or manager in charge of the business, is it to be said that there is no remedy if drink is sold by the person so charged with the duty of managing the place to any number of drunken persons? It is clear that there is no machinery by which the person actually selling the drink can be convicted of the offence. A penalty can be imposed on the licensee only. It is impossible to give to this section the narrow construction contended for by the respondent.

Looking to the whole scope and object of the Act, it seems to me that, wholly apart from authority, which I think is absolute upon the point, it was intended that the responsibility should be put directly upon the licensee for acts there mentioned which are done within the scope of the authority of the employee. Some of the authorities which have been referred to on behalf of the respondent have no bearing upon the point—namely, the cases as to gaming. No one could contend that a barman has, as part of his implied authority, any sanction from the master to carry on gaming. I have only to add that I do not think there is any real hardship in this case, because if the magistrate be convinced that the publican honestly endeavoured to comply with the law, and if he has been made liable only by the acts of his servant, he can take that into account by imposing a small fine, and he can also abstain from directing that the conviction shall be recorded against the publican. But it would be a matter of very evil consequence if we felt ourselves obliged to hold that the respondent in such a case as this should be held not to be guilty of the offence charged. I think the case must go back to the learned magistrate.

WRIGHT, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion as to the construction of the section.

REDDAWAY v. BANHAM. (a.)

Trade name—Accurate and true description of goods—Right to use same name—Name calculated to mislead.

The respondents sold their goods under a name which was an accurate and true description of them, but the name used was that by which the goods of another manufacturer had been known to the trade, and the result of doing this was to cause purchasers to believe that they were buying the goods of the appellants.

Held, that the respondents could be restrained from so selling their goods, and an injunction was accordingly granted.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (43 W. R. 294, [1895] 1 Q. B. 286) reversed.

This was an appeal from the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., Lopes and Rigby, L.JJ.) reported 43 W. R. 294, [1895] 1 Q. B. 286. The following statement of facts is taken from Lord Herschell's judgment.

The appellant Frank Reddaway has been for many years a manufacturer of machine belting. In October, 1892, the company, the other appellant, was incorporated; and the business has since been carried on by it.

In the year 1877 the appellant Reddaway commenced making belting from yarn which consisted principally of wool or hair, and sold it under the name of "woollen belting." About the year 1879 he commenced calling the belting which he manufactured "camel-hair belting," for the purpose of distinguishing it from the belting of other manufacturers. A large proportion of the appellant's trade has been with India, the colonies, and foreign countries. The belting consigned to these countries was stamped with a camel, or with the word "camel," or "camel hair," and sometimes with both.

The yarn of which the appellant's belting chiefly consists is, for the most part, made of camel hair. I gather from the evidence that, although the wool or hair of which the yarn was made was commonly called "camel hair," it was not generally known (at all events until recently) that it really consisted of the hair of the camel.

The respondent Banham was formerly in the employment of the appellant Reddaway. He ceased to be so employed in the year 1889, and commenced manufacturing belting on his own account. He made belting from yarn of the same description as that used by the appellants, which he sold and advertised as Arabian belting.

The respondent company was formed in 1891, and in April or May of that year commenced calling their belting "camel-hair belting," those words, and those words only, being in most cases stamped on the belting. Many other manufacturers had made, for many years past, belting the principal ingredient of which was camel-hair yarn, and which they have sold and described by such names as yak, buffalo, llama, crocodile, &c.

The appellants having learned that the respondents were selling belting described as "camel-hair belting," and with those words stamped upon it, brought the present action, which was tried at Manchester before Collins, J., and a special jury. The questions left by the learned judge to the jury, with their answers thereto, were as follow: 1. Does "camel-hair belting" mean belting made by the plaintiffs as distinguished from belting made by other manufacturers? Answer, Yes. 2. Or does it mean belting of a particular kind without reference to any particular maker? Answer, No. 3. Do the defendants so describe their belting as to be likely to mislead purchasers, and to lead them to buy the defendants' belting, and for the belting of the plaintiffs? Answer, Yes. 4. Did the defendants endeavour to pass off their goods, as for the goods of the plaintiffs, so as to be likely to deceive purchasers? Answer, Yes.

The learned judge considered the three first questions only to be necessary; but added the fourth question at the instance of the counsel for the plaintiffs.

Upon the findings of the jury Collins, J., entered judgment for the plaintiffs, with costs; and he granted an injunction restraining the defendants from continuing to use the words "camel hair" in such a manner as to lead purchasers into the belief that they are purchasing belting of the plaintiffs' manufacture, and from thereby passing off their belting as and for the belting of the plaintiffs' manufacture.

On appeal, the judgment of Collins, J., was reversed, and judgment entered for the defendants. In the opinion of the Court of Appeal, inasmuch as the words "camel-hair belting" were descriptive of the article sold, the words "camel hair" indicating the material of which it was made, the defendants were entitled to use the same language with reference to the belting which they sold; and the plaintiffs could have no right to restrain them from doing so, even though, as the jury had found, the words "camel-hair belting" would be understood to mean belting manufactured by the plaintiffs, and purchasers of the belting would be deceived into the belief that they were obtaining goods of the plaintiffs' manufacture.

No reply was called for, and the House took time for consideration.

Lord HALSBURY, C.—I believe in this case that the question turns upon a question of fact. The question of law is so constantly mixed up with the various questions of fact which arise on an inquiry of the character in which your lordships have been engaged, that it is sometimes difficult, when examining former decisions, to disentangle what is decided as fact and what is laid down as a principle of law. For myself, I believe the principle of law may be very plainly stated, and that is, that nobody has any right to represent his goods as the goods of somebody else.

How far the use of particular words, signs, or pictures does or does not come up to the proposition which I have enunciated in each particular case must always be a question of evidence, and the more simple the phraseology, the more like a mere description of the articles sold comes to be nearer to or far from a representation of the goods of the rival manufacturer, the greater becomes the difficulty of proof; but if the proof establishes the fact the legal consequence appears to follow.

In this case the words "camel-hair belting" suggest such a difficulty of proof. If I had been sitting as a juryman in this case, I confess (but for a circumstance I am about to mention) I should have had great difficulty in acquiescing in the contention that a person was making his goods pass as the goods of somebody else by simply describing the subject of sale by these words. The article here is partly made or substantially made of camel hair, and it is belting. To me or to other persons not familiar with the trade this undoubtedly does seem simply a description of the article sold, and not a representation of its being made by a particular manufacturer. But then I should not know—what persons engaged in the trade would know—how far particular words, even though descriptive of the article sold, may have acquired a kind of technical signification which would give to them in the trade as completely the character of being made by a particular manufacturer as if they were stamped with his trade-mark.

The circumstance to which I referred is to be found in the letter of the 12th of June, 1891. The writer, who doubtless knew what he was doing, specially desires that the thing which he is ordering should bear no other stamp than "camel-hair belting," and if he gets that he adds, "I think I can take this order from Reddaway's."

I think, with this letter before them, the jury were perfectly right, and that my primâ facie impression of the words being only descriptive of the article sold would have been wrong. The result is, in my mind, that the proof is satisfactory, and that one man's goods are being sold as if they were the goods of the other.

Reliance appears to have been placed in the Court of Appeal on what was supposed to be decided in Burgess v. Burgess by Knight-Bruce, L.J., and Sir George Turner, and I think it is necessary to examine the decision in Burgess v. Burgess to see what it really did decide, and the facts upon which that decision was based.

Kindersley, V.C., had by an injunction restrained the defendant from continuing to use the words "late of 107, Strand," where he had been employed by his father, and from continuing on the sides of his shop door a plate with the words "Burgess's Fish Sauce Warehouse, late of 107, Strand."

The defendant Burgess had for many years been in the employment of his father in the trade of an Italian and fish sauce warehouseman, and had shortly before the application for the injunction set up in King William-street a similar business, placing the words which the Vice-Chancellor restrained the use of on his shop door and the sides of his house.

An appeal was brought against the refusal of the Vice-Chancellor to go further, and to prohibit the use of the words "Burgess's essence of anchovies" in any bill-head, invoice, or advertisement.

The refusal of Knight-Bruce, L.J., to interfere with what the Vice-Chancellor had determined is stated by himself to be grounded on the fact that the defendant carried on business under his own name, and "sells his essence of anchovies as Burgess's essence of anchovies, which in truth it is." "The whole ground of complaint," says Knight-Bruce, L.J., "is the great celebrity which during many years has been possessed by the elder Mr. Burgess's essence of anchovies." Again, be it observed, treating the words "essence of anchovies" as describing a known article not peculiar to any one manufacturer. "That," continued the learned judge, "does not give him such exclusive right, such a monopoly, such a privilege, as to prevent any man from making essence of anchovies, and selling it under his own name."

And Turner, L.J., I think, most accurately says: "It is a question of evidence in each case whether there is false representation or not. Looking at the labels before us, I think it is clear that, since the order made by the Vice-Chancellor, there has been no representation made on the part of the defendant that the goods which he is selling are the goods manufactured by the plaintiff."

I only have to add to that, that even then the learned judges did not conclude the question, for, dealing with an interlocutory injunction as they were, they left the plaintiff, if he thought proper, to try his action at law, and make out, if he could, that there was the false representation which, if made, would give a ground of action. But it is most important to observe the hypothesis of fact upon which that judgment proceeds; and if the facts such as have been established in this case could have been made out, I cannot understand that there is any principle of law laid down which would have prevented an injunction, although the defendant's name was "Burgess," and although the article was described by a descriptive name which, however, had not as matter of fact in that case, in the view of the judges, the technical signification of being only made by Burgess, the father.

It seems to me, therefore, that there is nothing in that decision, or indeed in any other, which interferes with the propriety of an injunction where the proposition of fact with which I have started can be established; and it is to be observed that, whatever the form of the injunction, if the principle of it is duly observed, it is only such a form as prevents the mischief pointed to.

It would be impossible, for instance, to say that a trader could not describe his goods truly by enumerating the particulars of what they consisted, unless such description was calculated to deceive, and made his goods pass as the goods of another.

What in each case or in each trade will produce the effect intended to be prohibited is a matter which must depend upon the circumstances of each trade and the peculiarities of each trade.

It would be very rash a priori to say how far a thing might or might not be described without being familiar with the technology of the trade.

For these reasons I move that the judgment of the Court of Appeal be reversed, and that the respondents do pay to the appellants the costs both here and below.

Lord HERSCHELL, after stating the facts as above, said:—The Master of the Rolls expressed the view that a manufacturer might obtain the right to prevent a person using a name which would be understood as his, and the use of which would thus interfere with his trade; but that, though this was a fundamental proposition, you could not restrain a man from telling the simple truth, and this was all the defendants had done when they called their belting "camel-hair belting."

It must be taken, if the findings of the jury are to stand, on which I shall have a word or two to say presently, that the description by the defendants of their belting as "camel-hair belting" would deceive purchasers into the belief that they were getting something which they were not getting—namely, belting made by Reddaway. If they would be thus deceived by the defendants' statement, there must surely be some fallacy in saying that they have told the simple truth. I will state presently where I think the fallacy lurks. Before I do so, however, it is right that I should say that there appears to me abundant evidence to support the findings of the jury.

For many years belting made of camel-hair yarn had been known in the markets of the world. It had been sold under a variety of names. But there was ample evidence to justify the finding that, amongst those who were the purchasers of such goods, the words "camel hair" were not applied to belting made of that material in general; that, in short, it did not mean in the market belting made of a particular material, but belting made by a particular manufacturer. It is impossible, I think, to read the correspondence which passed between the defendants and those who were ordering goods of, or procuring orders for, them without seeing that this was the case. Moreover, it is impossible to doubt that the defendants were well aware of the fact.

They begin by calling their belting "Arabian," and state that they are prepared to guarantee it "to be better than the belting commonly called camel-hair belting." They are told by one of their correspondents that if he has a sample similar to one he forwards (which was made by Reddaway), "stamped camel-hair belting, nothing more," he thinks he can take this order from Reddaway's. They do their best to comply with their correspondent's wish, and send belting so stamped. Another correspondent asks for 500 feet, which is to be quite equal to Reddaway's "camel-hair belting," and which must be in every respect identical to the sample of that make. It was to be stamped "Warranted best camel-hair belting." In that or another case, it is not quite clear which, the defendants stated to the firm whom they employed to manufacture the belting that no manufacturer's name must appear on it, or it would be useless. I see no reason to be otherwise than completely satisfied with the answers which the jury gave. On this assumption I proceed to inquire whether the plaintiffs have made out any right to relief.

I cannot help saying that, if the defendants are entitled to lead purchasers to believe that they are getting the plaintiffs' manufacture when they are not, and thus to cheat them of some of their legitimate trade, I should regret to find that the law was powerless to enforce the most elementary principles of commercial morality. I do not think your lordships are driven to any such conclusion.

The principle which is applicable to this class of cases was, in my judgment, well laid down by Lord Kingsdown in Leather Cloth Co. v. American Cloth Co. It had been previously enunciated in much the same way by Lord Langdale in the case of Croft v. Day. Lord Kingsdown's words were as follow: "The fundamental rule is that one man has no right to put off his goods for sale as the goods of a rival trader, and he cannot therefore (in the language of Lord Langdale, in the case of Perry v. Truefitt, 6 Beav. 66), 'be allowed to use names, marks, letters, or other indicia by which he may induce purchasers to believe that the goods which he is selling are the manufacture of another person.'" It is, in my opinion, this fundamental rule which governs all cases, whatever be the particular mode adopted by any man for putting off his goods as those of a rival trader, whether it is done by the use of a mark which has become his trade-mark, or in any other way. The word "property" has been sometimes applied to what has been termed a trade-mark at common law. I doubt myself whether it is accurate to speak of there being property in such a trade-mark, though, no doubt, some of the rights which are incident to property may attach to it. Where the trade-mark is a word or device never in use before, and meaningless except as indicating by whom the goods in connection with which it is used were made, there could be no conceivable legitimate use of it by another person. His only object in employing it in connection with goods of his manufacture must be to deceive. In circumstances such as these the mere proof that the trade-mark of one manufacturer had been thus appropriated by another would be enough to bring the case within the rule as laid down by Lord Kingsdown, and to entitle the person aggrieved to an injunction to restrain its use. In the case of a trade-mark thus identified with a particular manufactory the rights of the person whose trade-mark it was would not, it may be, differ substantially from those which would exist if it were, strictly speaking, his property. But there are other cases which equally come within the rule that a man may not pass off his goods as those of his rival, which are not of this simple character—cases where the mere use of the particular mark or device which had been employed by another manufacturer would not of itself necessarily indicate that the person who employed it was thereby inducing purchasers to believe that the goods he was selling were the goods of another manufacturer.

The name of a person, or words forming part of the common stock of language, may become so far associated with the goods of a particular maker that it is capable of proof that the use of them by themselves without explanation or qualification by another manufacturer would deceive a purchaser into the belief that he was getting the goods of A. when he was really getting the goods of B. In a case of this description, the mere proof by the plaintiff that the defendant was using a name, word, or device which he had adopted to distinguish his goods would not entitle him to any relief. He could only obtain it by proving further that the defendant was using it under such circumstances or in such manner as to put off his goods as the goods of the plaintiff. If he could succeed in proving this, I think he would, on well-established principles, be entitled to an injunction.

In my opinion, the doctrine on which the judgment of the Court of Appeal was based—that where a manufacturer has used as his trade-mark a descriptive word he is never entitled to relief against a person who so uses it as to induce in purchasers the belief that they are getting the goods of the manufacturer who has theretofore employed it as his trade-mark—is not supported by authority, and cannot be defended on principle. I am unable to see why a man should be allowed in this way more than in any other to deceive purchasers into the belief that they are getting what they are not, and thus to filch the business of a rival. The authority relied on was the case of Burgess v. Burgess. When the judgments in that case are examined, it seems to me clear that no such point was decided. Turner, L.J., commences by saying: "No man can have any right to represent his goods as the goods of another person; but in applications of this kind it must be made out that the defendant is selling his own goods as the goods of another."

He then points out that where a person is selling goods under a particular name, and a person not having that name is using it, it may be presumed that he so uses it to represent the goods sold by himself as the goods of the person whose name he uses; but where the defendant sells goods under his own name, and it happens that the plaintiff has the same name, it does not follow that the defendant is selling his goods as the goods of the plaintiff. He adds: "It is a question of evidence in each case whether there is a false representation or not." This, I think, clearly recognizes that a man may so use even his own name in connection with the sale of goods as to make a false representation. In Massam v. Thorley's Cattle Food Co., James, L.J., said: "Burgess v. Burgess has been very much misunderstood if it has been understood to decide that anybody can always use his own name as a description of an article, whatever may be the consequences of it, or whatever may be the result of it." After quoting from the judgment of Turner, L.J., the passages to which I have just alluded, he said: "That I take to be an accurate statement of the law, and to have been adopted by the House of Lords in Wotherspoon v. Currie, in which the House of Lords differed from the view which I had taken." The decision in Wotherspoon v. Currie is an important one, and is, in my judgment, inconsistent with the ratio decidendi of the Court of Appeal in the present case. The name "Glenfield" had become associated with the starch manufactured by the plaintiff, and the defendant, although he established his manufactory at Glenfield, was restrained from using that word in connection with his goods in such a way as to deceive. Where the name of a place precedes the name of an article sold, it primâ facie means that this is its place of production or manufacture. It is descriptive, as it strikes me, in just the same sense as "camel hair" is descriptive of the material of which the plaintiffs' belting is made. Lord Westbury pointed out that the term "Glenfield" had acquired in the trade a secondary signification different from its primary one—that in connection with the word "starch" it had come to mean starch which was the manufacture of the plaintiff. In the case of Massam v. Thorley's Cattle Food Co., just referred to, James, L.J., said: "The defendant was actually manufacturing starch at Glenfield, having gone thither for the purpose of enabling him to say that he was manufacturing it at Glenfield. The House of Lords said the mere fact that he was really carrying on his manufacture at Glenfield, and was not therefore telling a lie, did not exempt him from the consequence of the fact that his proceedings were intended and calculated to produce on the mind of the purchasers the belief that his article was the article of the plaintiffs."

I think this view of the decision of the House of Lords was correct, and that it is at variance with the view taken by the Court of Appeal, that the defendants could not be liable to an action because in using the words "camel hair" in connection with his belting they were simply telling the truth. I rather demur, however, to the statement of James, L.J., that the defendant in Wotherspoon v. Currie was not telling a lie in calling his starch "Glenfield starch," as I do to the view that the defendants in this case were telling the simple truth when they sold their belting as camel-hair belting. I think the fallacy lies in overlooking the fact that a word may acquire in a trade a secondary signification differing from its primary one, and that if it is used to persons in the trade who will understand it, and be known and intended to understand it, in its secondary sense, it will none the less be a falsehood that in its primary sense it may be true. A man who uses language which will convey to persons reading or hearing it a particular idea which is false, and who knows and intends this to be the case, is not surely to be absolved from a charge of falsehood because in another sense which will not be conveyed, and is not intended to be conveyed, it is true. In the present case the jury have found, and in my opinion there was ample evidence to justify it, that the words "camel hair" had in the trade acquired a secondary signification in connection with belting; that they did not convey to persons dealing in belting the idea that it was made of camel's hair, but that it was belting manufactured by the plaintiffs. They have found that the effect of using the words in the manner in which they were used by the defendants would be to lead purchasers to believe that they were obtaining goods manufactured by the plaintiffs, and thus both to deceive them and to injure the plaintiffs. On authority, as well as on principle, I think the plaintiffs are on these facts entitled to relief.

The case of Massam v. Thorley's Cattle Food Co., in the judgment of James, L.J., from which I have already made quotations, is an authority in favour of the plaintiffs' contention. It was argued for the respondents that in that case there was fraud, inasmuch as Thorley, whose name formed part of the designation of the company, had only a small, indeed it may be said a nominal, interest in it. I do not think this was the foundation of the judgment; the reasoning of James, L.J., would have been equally forcible if Thorley's interest had been the principal one. The company had quite as much right to call themselves by the name they adopted as by any other. What they were restrained from doing was endeavouring to pass off their goods as the goods of another manufacturer. This was the wrongful act which brought them within the reach of the law, and not the particular means by which they carried out their design. Besides the cases which I have referred to, there are other authorities which support the appellants' case. I need only mention one—the case of Montgomery v. Thompson in your lordships' House. It was said in the court below that the judgment there proceeded on the ground that the defendant had acted fraudulently. But the only fraud consisted in doing acts designed to cause persons to purchase his goods as and for the plaintiffs'. The acts commented on were only the means devised to accomplish that end. On the findings of the jury, I think precisely the same kind of fraud is present in the case under appeal. I ought, perhaps, to notice the case of Turton v. Turton, which was said to be an authority in the respondents' favour. That case was, I think, an entirely different one. There was no proof that the defendants were passing off their goods as those of the plaintiffs; the utmost that was shown was that similarity (there was not identity) in the name of the firms might lead incautious persons to make mistakes. Reliance was placed for the respondents upon the decision of Wood, V.C., in Young v. Macrae, and in the Court of Appeal Rigby, L.J., regarded it as adverse to the plaintiffs' contention. When carefully examined I do not think it is so. Where a patentee attaches a particular name to the production he patents, that name becomes common property as descriptive of the patented article. It possesses, indeed, no other name. That name would necessarily be applied to it by all persons desiring to purchase the article. It is not descriptive of the production of a particular manufacturer, but of the article itself, by whomsoever it is manufactured. Indeed, there is no presumption that the patentee will manufacture it, even during the term of the patent; more often than not patented articles are manufactured by other persons by the licence of the patentee.

What right, it was asked, can an individual have to restrain another from using a common English word because he has chosen to employ it as his trade-mark? I answer, He has no such right; but he has a right to insist that it shall not be used without explanation or qualification if such a use would be an instrument of fraud. Who suffer injury by such a conclusion, or would be the worse if the defendant is thus restrained? It has been shown that the public have not needed the words "camel hair" to describe a particular kind of belting—that the words have never been used in the trade in that sense. What James, L.J., said in Thorley's case is applicable to the present. He observed: "Thorley's food for cattle had never become an article of commerce as distinguished from the particular manufactory from which it had proceeded."

It is not proposed, in the present case, to prohibit the use of the words "camel hair" altogether. The injunction granted by Collins, J., had not that effect. In the case just referred to the counsel for the plaintiff, at the conclusion of the judgment, asked whether the substance of their lordships' judgment was not that the defendants were not to use the name Thorley in connection with their cattle food. James, L.J., replied, "We cannot prohibit them using the name, if they use it in a way not calculated to mislead the public." I say the same about the use of the words "camel hair" in the present case.

For these reasons, I think the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be reversed.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—In this case your lordships are not asked, at least by the appellants, to lay down any new law. The appellants are content to rely on the old and familiar doctrines of the court, which have been repeated over and over again.

"I have often endeavoured," said James, L.J., in Singer Manufacturing Co. v. Loog, a well-known trade-mark case in which there was no claim to a registered mark—"I have often endeavoured to express what I am going to express now (and probably I have said it in the same words, because it is very difficult to find other words in which to express it)—that is, that no man is entitled to represent his goods as being the goods of another man; and no man is permitted to use any mark, sign, or symbol, device, or other means whereby, without making a direct false representation himself to a purchaser who purchases from him, he enables such purchaser to tell a lie, or to make a false representation to somebody else who is the ultimate customer. That being, as it appears to me, a comprehensive statement of what the law is upon the question of trade-mark or trade designation, I am of opinion that there is no such thing as a monopoly, or a property, in the nature of a copyright, or in the nature of a patent, in the use of any name. Whatever name is used to designate goods, anybody may use that name to designate goods; always subject to this, that he must not, as I said, make directly or through the medium of another person a false representation that his goods are the goods of another person. That I take to be the law."

I have cited this passage because it seems to me to state clearly the principle on which Mr. Reddaway and his associates are entitled to relief against Mr. Banham and the company of which he is managing director. The substance of Mr. Reddaway's complaint, as I understand it, is that Mr. Banham is putting his goods on the market under a designation which enables purchasers from him to tell a lie or to make a false representation to their customers. It is immaterial that the designation in question, taken by itself, would convey to a person not conversant with the trade, information which cannot be called untrue, if by means of that designation Mr. Banham does make, not indeed directly, but through the medium of other persons, a false representation that his goods are the goods of Reddaway.

Reddaway and Banham—I use those names for shortness—are both manufacturers of hair belting, a kind of belting which is much used for driving machinery. This article has a large sale at home and abroad. In countries where the heat is great and the air very dry it is preferable to leather. Hair belting, whoever the maker of it may be, is generally composed, more or less, of stuff imported into England and sold in the English market as "camel hair." Until recently nobody seems to have imagined that the camel hair of commerce was true to name. It was believed to be a mixture of hair—hair of sheep and goats, and various eastern animals—in which the hair of the camel might be found, but which did not even pretend to be really camel's hair. Indeed, so little importance was attached to its nominal connection with the camel that, until it acquired some celebrity through Reddaway's manufacture, the yarn made from it used to be sold in the market simply as brown worsted.

It seems to have been the fashion for manufacturers of hair belting to distinguish their goods by the name of some chosen animal, hairy or hairless. There was, for example, buffalo belting, yak belting, and crocodile belting. Reddaway, unfortunately for him, as it has turned out, selected the camel as his emblem. He called his belting "camel-hair belting." Owing to the excellence of his manufacture, his belting became widely known all over the world. It was advertised as camel-hair belting. It was ordered, sold, and invoiced as such; and so camel-hair belting came to mean Reddaway's belting, and nothing else. It was admitted at the trial that for about fourteen years no belting had been made or sold under the description of camel hair or camel-hair belting except by Reddaway, and certain persons whom he had promptly challenged and stopped. Indeed, so long as the expression "camel-hair belting" was taken to be a fanciful designation Reddaway had no difficulty in holding the field against any interloper who hoped to find more profit and less trouble in trading on another man's reputation than on his own merits.

Banham was for two years in the employment of Reddaway at his works. In 1889 he set up for himself, and began to make hair belting. Like others in the trade, he used more or less the camel hair of commerce. At first he called his belting "Arabian belting." Then he began cautiously and tentatively to offer his goods as camel-hair belting. After 1891, when he turned his business into a limited company, his proceedings were marked with less caution; at last they attracted Reddaway's attention, and then the present action was brought.

The action was undoubtedly launched on the footing that the expression "camel-hair belting" was a fanciful term. But in the course of the trial it was proved, partly by the evidence of experts and partly by an exhibit collected from a living animal in the Zoological Gardens at Manchester, that the camel hair of commerce, of which many bundles were produced, was really and truly for the most part composed of genuine camel's hair. This evidence seems to have come as a revelation to Reddaway and his advisers. However, they accepted the situation, and forbore to contest the point further. And so it was established that Reddaway's trade designation, instead of being, as everybody supposed, a fanciful term, was nothing more or less than a substantially accurate description of the material of which his belting was composed. Now the Court of Appeal treat this discovery as the end of the whole matter. They hold that on this one fact being established Banham became entitled to put his goods on the market as camel-hair belting without any qualification whatever. Anybody and everybody who may want to get a footing in the connection which Reddaway has formed is now free, if the Court of Appeal is right, to use Reddaway's password. The appellants concede—they cannot, indeed, any longer dispute—that everybody who makes belting of camel hair is entitled to describe his belting as camel-hair belting, provided he does so fairly. But they contend, and I think with reason, that neither Banham nor anybody else is entitled to steal Reddaway's trade under colour of imparting accurate, and possibly interesting, information. Practically the only difference which the unexpected turn in the evidence has made is this: the case now comes under the second branch of the proposition laid down by James, L.J.; if camel-hair belting had kept its place as a fanciful term, it would have fallen under the first.

The learned counsel for the respondents maintained that the expression "camel-hair belting" used by Banham was "the simple truth." Their proposition was that "where a man is simply telling the truth as to the way in which his goods are made, or as to the materials of which they are composed, he cannot be held liable for mistakes which the public may make." That seems to me to be rather begging the question. Can it be said that the description "camel-hair belting" as used by Banham is the simple truth? I will not call it an abuse of language to say so, but certainly it is not altogether a happy expression. The whole merit of that description, its one virtue for Banham's purposes, lies in its duplicity. It means two things. At Banham's works, where it cannot mean Reddaway's belting, it may be construed to mean belting made of camel's hair; abroad, to the German manufacturer, to the Bombay mill-owner, to the up-country native, it must mean Reddaway's belting; it can mean nothing else. I venture to think that a statement which is literally true, but which is intended to convey a false impression, has something of a faulty ring about it; it is not sterling coin, it has no right to the genuine stamp and impress of truth.

I have now dealt with the only peculiarity in the case. For the rest, the action is one of a very ordinary type.

In a trial which lasted three days, after a summing-up which seems to me to be admirably concise and clear, a special jury of the county of Lancaster found that camel-hair belting means belting made by Reddaway, and that it does not mean belting of a particular kind without reference to any particular maker. They also found that the defendants—that is, Banham and the company with which he is connected—describe their belting so as to be likely to mislead purchasers, and to lead them to buy the defendants' belting as and for the belting of the plaintiffs.

There was another finding, not perhaps necessary for the decision, on which I desire to say a few words. It is stated in the judgment of the Master of the Rolls that the learned counsel for the plaintiffs at the trial did not appear to have asked the judge to leave to the jury the question whether the defendants had done anything fraudulently. "Indeed," his lordship adds, "no such question seems to have been raised by the pleadings." If your lordships turn to the pleadings, you will observe that the question was raised directly. It is quite true that the word "fraud" is not to be found in the statement of claim. But the whole gist of the action was that the defendants were endeavouring to palm off their goods as the goods of the plaintiffs by selling them under a designation which would enable purchasers from them in this country to deceive customers abroad. That is, as it seems to me, a charge of dishonesty, and I must say I think the charge was established. It was proved by admissions wrung from Mr. Banham on cross-examination, and by the correspondence which was put in evidence. When a manufacturer's goods are a drug on the market so long as they bear his own name or indicate the true origin, and yet are readily saleable if marked with nothing but some common English words which are taken to mean the work of another and a different maker, and when that manufacturer holds himself out as ready and willing so to mark his goods, and does so mark them at the "instigation," as he says, of a purchaser, a Lancashire jury may perhaps be trusted to see the real object in view. The jury found, and in my opinion rightly found, that the defendants endeavoured to pass off their goods as and for the goods of the plaintiffs.

Cases of this sort must depend upon their particular circumstances. The facts of one case are little or no guide to the determination of another. I do not therefore propose to trouble your lordships with any reference to authorities except those relied on in the judgment of the Court of Appeal. The judgment of Turner, L.J., in Burgess v. Burgess, though eclipsed, as it has been said, in public favour by the brilliancy and point of his colleague's language, is an accurate and masterly summary of the law. But it seems to me to be an authority in favour of Reddaway, and not in favour of Banham. I am quite at a loss to know why Turton v. Turton has been reported. The plaintiff's case there was extravagant and absurd. With regard to the case of Young v. Macrae, which is referred to at some length, it must be remembered that it was a judgment on an interlocutory application, and that the Vice-Chancellor reserved the question for the hearing, with an intimation that it would then deserve serious consideration. It does not seem to me to have any bearing upon the present case, and I only notice it to observe that whenever it is quoted the Vice-Chancellor's comments upon his own decision ought not to be lost sight of. "I had to consider this question," said the Vice-Chancellor on a later occasion, "in the case of Young's paraffin oil; and in that case, if the evidence had shown that the plaintiff had been first to apply the name 'paraffin' to the oil, I should have granted an injunction; but there I had it proved that the name 'paraffin oil' had long been known as the scientific name of the article, and that the defendant could not well have called it anything else." Lastly, the case of Montgomery v. Thompson was cited, but only for the purpose of putting it aside; I am sure I do not know why. That was a gross case, no doubt. But fraud is infinite in variety: sometimes it is audacious and unblushing; sometimes it pays a sort of homage to virtue, and then it is modest and retiring; it would be honesty itself if it could only afford it. But fraud is fraud all the same; and it is the fraud, not the manner of it, which calls for the interposition of the court. In principle and in substance I can see no difference between the present case and Montgomery v. Thompson.

In the result, I am of opinion that the appeal must be allowed with costs. But as regards the form of the injunction, speaking for myself, I should be disposed to say that in all cases where the defendant is to be restrained from using unfairly words or marks which he is at liberty to use provided only they are used fairly, it would be better that the injunction should go in the form approved by this House in Johnston v. Orr-Ewing, 30 W. R. 417, 7 App. Cas. 219.

Lord MORRIS.—I have felt some difficulty in concurring as I do in the judgment proposed to be given in favour of the appellants by your lordships, for it establishes, and in my opinion for the first time, the proposition that a trader is not permitted to merely tell truthfully and accurately the material of which his goods are made. I find myself coerced, however, to a conclusion against the respondents by the finding of the jury, which amounts to this—that camel-hair belting had become so identified with the name of the appellants Reddaway as that camel-hair belting had in the market obtained the meaning of Reddaway's belting; and there was sufficient evidence given at the trial to support that finding of the jury. That finding establishes as a fact that the use of the words "camel-hair belting" simpliciter deceives purchasers; and it becomes necessary for the respondents to remove that false impression so made on the public. That something, to my mind, is obviously done when the respondents put prominently and in a conspicuous place on the article the statement that it was camel-hair belting manufactured by themselves. Having done so, they would, as it appears to me, fully apprise purchasers that it was not Reddaway's make by stating that it was their own. A representation deceiving the public is and must be the foundation of the appellants' right to recover; they are not entitled to any monopoly of the name "camel-hair belting" irrespective of its deceiving the public, and everyone has a right to describe truly his article by that name, provided he distinguishes it from the appellants' make. In this case the respondents did not so distinguish it, because they omitted to state that it was their own make. Consequently I concur in the motion which has been made.

Order appealed from reversed, with costs here and below; declared that judgment ought to be entered for the plaintiffs in the Queen's Bench Division "for an injunction restraining the defendants and each of them from using the words "camel hair" as descriptive of or in connection with belting manufactured by them or either of them, or belting (not being of the plaintiffs' manufacture) sold or offered for sale by them or either of them without clearly distinguishing such belting from the belting of the plaintiffs; with this declaration judgment of Collins, J., in all other respects restored; cause remitted to the Queen's Bench Division.

ADCOCK v. EVANS. (a.)

Administration—Right of retainer—Debt under covenant—Surety—Specialty and simple contract creditors.

By an indenture of mortgage A., the mortgagor, covenanted with B., a surety, to duly pay all moneys secured by the mortgage, and to keep indemnified property mortgaged by B. against all such moneys, and in case B. should pay any money for redemption forthwith to repay such money with interest. A. died, and B. was appointed A.'s administratrix. The day named in the mortgage for repayment of the principal was past, but no part thereof was paid. On an application by specialty creditors of A. under an indenture of lease for payment of their debt,

Held, on the authority of Lethbridge v. Mytton, 2 B. & Ad. 772, and Loosemore v. Radford, 9 M. & W. 657, that if B. had not been administratrix B. could have sued on the first branch of the above covenant for the whole of the moneys secured by the mortgage and recovered the same as damages at law, and therefore that B. was entitled to retain to that extent as against the applicants.

Summons.

This was a summons for payment out of the estate of the above-named intestate of three quarters' rent due from the intestate under an indenture of lease dated in 1886, or for administration.

The defendant, who was administratrix, claimed a right of retainer to an amount exceeding the whole amount of the estate.

By an indenture of mortgage, dated in 1893, the intestate covenanted for the repayment to R., with interest, six months after the date thereof, of £800 advanced to the intestate by R.; and certain leasehold premises then held for the intestate for life, with remainder to the defendant absolutely, under a voluntary settlement made by the intestate in 1877, were, by the direction of the intestate and of the defendant, demised to R. for the residue of the term for which the same were held, as security for payment of the £800 and interest; and the intestate covenanted with the defendant to duly pay all moneys by the same indenture covenanted to be paid, and to keep indemnified the estate and intestate of the defendant in the said leasehold premises against all such moneys; and in case the defendant should at any time thereafter pay any moneys for the redemption of the said leasehold premises, forthwith to repay such money, with interest.

The intestate died in November, 1893, without having paid any part of the £800, which was still unpaid, but the defendant had kept down the interest since the death of the intestate.

The question was whether, under these circumstances, the defendant was entitled to retain a sum of about £400 in her hands as administratrix in respect of the £800 due on the above mortgage.

Eastwick, for the summons.—The defendant is not a specialty creditor, and cannot retain against the applicants, whose debt is a specialty debt.

Kirby, for the defendant.—The intestate covenanted with the defendant to pay all moneys secured by the mortgage, and there has been a breach of that covenant. If she were not administratrix, she could recover judgment at law for the full £800 on the covenant. The covenant distinguishes this case from Ferguson v. Gibson, L. R. 14 Eq. 379 (see p. 386), 21 W. R. Dig. 6. The cases at law of Lethbridge v. Mytton, 2 B. & Ad. 772, and Loosemore v. Radford, 9 M. & W. 657, show that she can recover the full amount as damages.

He also cited Re Compton, Norton v. Compton, 33 W. R. 160, 30 Ch. D. 15, and Mayne on Damages, 5th ed., p. 321.

Eastwick replied.

CHITTY, J.—The legal personal representative can retain only against a creditor of equal degree, and cannot retain for a simple contract debt against a specialty creditor. That is settled law.

Here the administratrix has a covenant from the intestate to duly pay all moneys covenanted to be paid by the mortgage. The intestate covenanted by the mortgage to pay the sum secured on a certain day which is now passed, and there has been a breach of that covenant. The administratrix could sue for the amount, if she were not paid, except for her double character. She is creditor and debtor too. What damages would she be entitled to recover? The cases at law show that the measure of damages would be the whole amount of the debt. [His lordship then read the intestate's covenant with the administratrix from the mortgage deed, and continued:—] There are three distinct covenants here in point of law, and, suing on the first covenant, the administratrix could recover, as I have stated, except for her double character. She is therefore a specialty creditor on the covenant at law for the whole debt, and it follows that she is entitled to retain to that extent.

Summons dismissed.

Ex parte RECTOR OF NEWTON HEATH. (a.)

Lands Clauses Act, 1845, s. 69—Reinvestment of purchase money—Rebuilding rectory.

In 1890 a rector rebuilt the rectory at a time when considerable repairs would otherwise have been necessary. In 1893 some of the glebe was acquired by the Manchester Ship Canal Co., and the purchase money paid into court. Part of the expenses of rebuilding the rectory was still unpaid; on a petition by the rector,

Held, that the sum remaining due could not be paid out of the fund in court.

Petition.

The rector of Newton Heath called in the diocesan surveyor in 1890. Having regard to the extensive repairs then required, the surveyor recommended that the rectory should be rebuilt. This was done at a cost of £1,388 15s. 6d. This money was raised by borrowing £600 from Queen Anne's Bounty, £100 was obtained from the Diocesan Building Society, £349 11s. 9d. was obtained by subscriptions, and £339 3s. 9d. still remained due.

In 1893 part of the glebe was taken by the Manchester Ship Canal Co., under its compulsory powers, and the purchase money was paid into court.

The rector now asked that the £339 3s. 9d., still due for rebuilding the rectory, might be paid out of the fund in court.

Rawlins, Q.C., and Milne, for the petitioner.—The case is very like Ex parte Rector of Claypole, L. R. 16, Eq. 574. Williams v. Aylesbury and Buckingham Railway Co., L. R. 9 Ch. App. 684, 23 W. R. Dig. 118, was a case in which the money had been paid. In Ex parte Rector of Bradfield St. Claire, 32 L. T. N. S. 248, the expenditure of the purchase money of glebe upon the erection of a new rectory was allowed. In Ex parte Rector of Grimoldby, 24 W. R. 723, 2 Ch. D. 225, expenditure upon repairs of the rectory house and the restoration of the chancel was authorized. In Ex parte Rector of Gamston, 24 W. R. 359, 1 Ch. D. 477, past outlay in erecting a farmhouse upon the glebe was made good to the rector out of the proceeds of sale of a portion of the glebe. In Ex parte Rector of Holywell-cum-Needingworth, 27 W. R. 707, past outlay on buildings forming a permanent improvement was allowed.

Dennis, for the Governors of Queen Anne's Bounty.—Our security will be diminished if this application is acceded to; the fund in court as well as the rectory is now charged. The rector has escaped liability for repairs by rebuilding, and he has obtained more favourable terms than he could have obtained in any other way.

(a.) Reported by G. B. HAMILTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Clare, for the Manchester Ship Canal Co.

Rawlins replied.

NORTH, J.—I do not see my way to allow this expenditure. The rector, who was appointed a few years before, called in the diocesan surveyor in 1890. He proceeded to make a careful survey, and raised the question that it would be better to rebuild the rectory than to repair it. This was done, and the cost was just under £1,390. The rector borrowed £600 of this from Queen Anne's Bounty, which is repayable by instalments. He also obtained £100 from the Diocesan Building Society, and subscriptions, and paid all but about £340.

In 1893 the Manchester Ship Canal took part of the glebe and paid the money into court, and the rector now asks that this £340 may be paid out of this money. I should have been glad to do it if I could; but there is no principle upon which I can allow such a payment. Several cases have been cited. In Ex parte Rector of Claypole improvements and additions to the parsonage house were allowed. But the case is distinguishable, for the money now asked for is not for improvements or additions. In Ex parte Rector of Bradfield St. Claire there was no parsonage house belonging to the rectory. The case before Hall, V.C. (Ex parte Rector of Claypole), is very shortly reported; but in both that case and Ex parte Rector of Holywell new buildings were erected where no buildings previously existed. What was done here was to build a new house, instead of incurring the considerable expense of repairs which would otherwise have been necessary. The rector has been saved from doing these repairs. Williams v. Aylesbury and Buckingham Railway Co. shows that if the rector had actually paid the money, the court would have no jurisdiction to order the sum to be paid back to him out of the fund in court. But here, although the money has not been paid, the expenditure has been incurred, and the result would be the rector would be put to no expense for the repairs for which he was liable in 1891 except the repayment of the instalments to Queen Anne's Bounty. I am sorry that I cannot assist him in the matter.

In re COOK'S MORTGAGE. LAWLEDGE v. TYNDALL. (a.)

Tenant in common—Improvements.

On a sale by a paramount mortgagee one-half the expenditure in improvements made by a person who was tenant in common in fee of one moiety and tenant for life of the other moiety, was allowed out of the proceeds of sale, but it was provided that the sum so allowed should not exceed one-half the amount actually expended.

By an indenture, dated the 3rd of May, 1878, certain land situate at Balsall Heath, King's Norton, in the county of Worcester, was vested (subject to a mortgage for £300 vested in C. C. Cope and E. M. Lawledge) as to one undivided moiety in Rebecca Cook in fee, and as to the other undivided moiety in trustees upon trust to pay the income to Rebecca Cook for life, and after her death upon trust to pay the income to Rebecca Payne (then Rebecca Nicholls) for life, with remainder upon trust for all the children of Rebecca Payne who should attain the age of twenty-one years.

In September, 1883, Rebecca Cook and Rebecca Payne mortgaged their interest under the indenture of the 3rd of May, 1878, to C. C. Cope and E. M. Lawledge to secure the repayment of £700 and interest. The £700 so advanced was expended in converting certain houses upon the property into shops.

In December, 1883, Rebecca Nicholls married John Payne, and in December, 1888, Rebecca Cook died intestate, leaving Sarah Ann Morse her heiress at law.

E. M. Lawledge survived C. C. Cope, and under the power in the original mortgage for £300 sold the property for £2,030. He now took out this summons to determine how the balance of the purchase money, after the payment of duty and the amount due to him as mortgagee, should be dealt with.

Briscoe, for the mortgagee.

Yate Lee, for the trustees of the indenture of the 3rd of May, 1878, and Rebecca Payne.—The value of the property was certainly increased by the improvements, but their present value is not more than £500. There is no jurisdiction to deduct anything from the share of a tenant in common who may have obtained the benefit of expenditure upon improvements, except in the case of a partition suit.

C. E. E. Jenkins, for the widower and child of Sarah Ann Morse, who had died intestate, cited In re Jones, Farrington v. Forrester, [1893] 2 Ch. 462; Leigh v. Dickeson, 33 W. R. 538, 15 Q. B. D. 60, and claimed an allowance of half the present value of the improvements not exceeding the amount actually expended.

NORTH, J., thought that the principle of the decision in In re Jones applied, and that the persons entitled to Rebecca Cook's moiety were entitled to one-half the present value of the improvements, provided that such sum did not amount to more than one-half of £700.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 18.—Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—I have had the opportunity of reading the written judgment of my brother Wills in this case, with which I agree, and I will only indicate very shortly the grounds of my judgment.

A rule nisi has been obtained for a mandamus requiring the Rural District Council of Tynemouth to approve certain building plans submitted to them by the Marquis of Hastings. The question is whether the applicant is entitled to have the rule made absolute. I have come to the conclusion that he is so entitled. Lord Hastings is the owner of considerable land within the rural district, and he contemplated building upon a portion of it a number of houses forming several streets. He submitted his plans to the District Council, appending to them this note: "N.B.—It is proposed that the street and outfall sewers should be made by the Rural District Council (and not by the landowner) under the powers vested in and the duties imposed on them by the Public Health Act, the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890, and the Private Streets Works Act, 1892." The Council had the plans before them, and no objection was taken to them as far as the buildings were concerned. But they disapproved the plans, and indicated their disapproval by the following memorandum indorsed on them: "Disapproved of until it is shown into what sewer or other means of drainage the house drains are to communicate and empty, and for want of a proper and sufficient mode of drainage and sewerage. The Council object to the proposal that they should make the street and outfall sewers except under agreement with and at the expense of the landowner or the depositor of these plans. Otherwise than this the Council require same to be made by such landowner or depositor."

It will thus be seen that the real bone of contention is not the propriety of the proposed plan of building as such, but the question whether the applicant or the local authority is to be liable in the future to make a line of sewers down the proposed streets and also the outfall sewer with which the street sewers are to communicate. The local authority have made bye-laws, but I fail to see that any of them deal with this question or require the building owner to show on his plans what is to be the ultimate mode of dealing with the sewerage.

The plans submitted by the applicant show that he contemplated that there should be a sewer down the middle of each street into which the house drains should discharge, and it is not suggested that there is anything in the levels shown on the plans which would make that impracticable. The question is, Can the local authority, who have no objection to the building plans as such, decline to approve them unless the owner undertakes to carry out the sewerage at his own expense, including the necessary sewage outfall works? The correspondence shows that he was willing to undertake the cost so far as sewerage on his own property was concerned, but he declined to execute the outfall works.

It seems to me that the requisition of the local authority was entirely unreasonable; for, although the local authority have statutory powers under which they can take land for sewage works, a private owner can only execute such works within his own property, he cannot go outside without obtaining authority from Parliament. The local authority contend that an owner cannot, by turning his land into a village or a town, throw upon them the burden of providing the necessary sewerage. The owner says that he cannot be required to construct sewers and outfall works, but drains only; and that the local authority can, by having his property formed into a special drainage district under section 277 of the Public Health Act, 1875, throw the sewerage expenses upon that property exclusively. Or they may, before taking the new streets over, by obtaining urban powers under section 150 of the same Act, require them to be properly sewered by the owners or occupiers under that section. It was argued before us that it is unreasonable to require a local authority to provide a system of sewerage for the benefit of the property of a particular owner. That argument, in my opinion, contains a fallacy; the local authority is not required to carry out a large scheme of sewerage at once, and as soon as the building scheme assumes large proportions the local authority may proceed in one of the ways I have mentioned, and so throw the cost upon the owner. It is impossible to support the view of the local authority that because the owner has not shown on his building plans an elaborate system of sewerage, and has not undertaken to carry it out at his own expense, they are entitled to disapprove those plans. That is not a proper ground for refusing to approve the plans. I therefore think that the District Council was wrong, and that this rule ought to be made absolute.

WILLS, J.—The facts of this case are extremely simple; not so the enactments upon which our decision turns.

The applicant is the owner of property in the district of a rural sanitary authority. He desires to put up certain considerable blocks of houses, comprising several streets, in a place which at present is a part of the open country. The defendants are the rural sanitary authority in question.

The applicant has submitted to the defendants plans showing the proposed new streets and containing the details of construction of his proposed buildings, from which it appears that he proposes to construct each house with a separate drain, ending at present, in each case, in the soil of a proposed new street, with no cesspool or other receptacle for drainage. The defendants refuse to approve his plans unless he will agree with them for the construction at his expense of the necessary main sewers—the existence of which his plans contemplate—with the necessary outfall and other works. No other objection has been taken to the plans, nor do they contravene either any bye-law or any provision of the Sanitary Acts.

The applicant asks the court to grant a mandamus to the defendants requiring them to approve the plans.

It is necessary to set out by ascertaining—if that be possible—what the enactments and bye-laws are which bear upon the subject.

The only enlargement that has been effected of the powers of the defendants as a rural sanitary authority is one conferred upon them by order of the Local Government Board, made under the powers of the Public Health Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 79), s. 23, and dated the 28th of December, 1874.

The order invested the defendants "with all the powers, rights, duties, capacities, liabilities, and obligations of an urban sanitary authority with reference to making and enforcing bye-laws and otherwise in respect to the following matters, viz.:—

1. "In respect to the various matters mentioned in section 32 of the Local Government Act, 1858, so far as the powers under that section are not already conferred upon the said sanitary authority in pursuance of section 8 of the Public Health Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 79), and section 5 of the Sanitary Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 115)."

2. "In respect to the various matters mentioned in section 34 of the Local Government Act, 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 98), and in section 44 of the Sanitary Laws Amendment Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 89)."

A word or two of explanation is necessary. The powers of the Acts of 1848 and 1858 were conferred by Order in Council either upon existing municipal and other corporations or upon boards of health constituted by Order in Council in particular localities. The Act of 1872 divided the whole country into districts, urban and rural, under the jurisdiction of urban and rural sanitary authorities—the urban authorities being the corporations of corporate towns and cities, improvement commissioners under local Acts, and existing local boards; the rural sanitary authorities being (with some qualifications) the boards of guardians of unions, and the rural sanitary districts being (also with some qualifications) the unions.

The powers of urban sanitary authorities were much more extensive than those of the rural authorities, and comprised all the powers vested in local boards under the Acts of 1848 and 1858 (see section 7 of the Act of 1872). Those of rural sanitary authorities were more limited, being confined to powers under the Sewage Utilization Acts, the Nuisances Removal Acts, the Common Lodging-house Acts, the Diseases Prevention Act, and the Bakehouse Regulation Act (see section 8 of the Act of 1872). But by section 23, the Local Government Board could, by order under seal, invest the rural authority with any of the powers of an urban authority specified in the order.

The order I am now discussing says, in a very roundabout fashion, in the first place, that the defendants shall have the powers of a local board under section 32 of the Act of 1858.

None of these, however, touch the present case, except in one matter presently to be noticed which may have a slight bearing upon it.

The second branch of the order confers upon the defendants the powers of a local board under section 34 of the Act of 1858, and under section 44 of the Act of 1874. The latter, again, do not concern this case, and so far as this case is concerned the defendants had under the order of 1874 only the powers of section 34 of the Act of 1858—for none of the ordinary powers of a rural sanitary authority under any of the Acts passed before the date of the order of the Local Government Board of December, 1874, enabled them to do anything under which the present question could have arisen, or which has anything to do with this case.

Under the applied powers of section 32 of the Act of 1858 the defendants acquired power to make bye-laws for the cleansing of privies, ashpits, and cesspools, and under the Sanitary Laws Amendment Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 89), s. 21, they become bound to make proper provision for such cleansing. It is an illustration of the tentative character of our sanitary legislation that I have not been able to find any provision applying to rural authorities only in any of the Acts under which their powers arose, up to this time, which contains any reference to water-closets.

The part of section 34 of the Local Government Act of 1858 which is material to the present case is that which—as the section is applied—empowers the defendants to make bye-laws "with respect to the drainage of buildings, to water-closets, privies, ashpits, and cesspools, in connection with buildings,' and also to "provide for the observance of the same by enacting therein such provisions as they think necessary as to the giving of notices, as to the deposit of plans and sections by persons intending to lay out streets or to construct buildings, and as to their power to remove, alter, or pull down any work begun or done in contravention of such bye-laws."

The next Act was the Public Health Act, 1875, by which every Act that has been referred to up to this point was repealed, with the single exception of the Bakehouse Regulation Act. The repeal, however, was not to affect anything duly done under any of the repealed Acts (section 343), and by section 313 of the Act of 1875 it is provided that where, in any order made by the Local Government Board and in force at the time of the passing of the Act of 1875, any provision of any of the Sanitary Acts (which term includes those mentioned in the order of 1874) repealed by this Act are mentioned or referred to, such order shall be read as if the provisions of the Act of 1875, applicable to purposes the same as or similar to those of the repealed provision, were therein mentioned or referred to, and were substituted for them.

Section 157 contains these substituted provisions, and with two trivial exceptions they are totidem verbis with those of section 34 of the Act of 1858, the only differences being that "urban sanitary authority" is substituted for "local board" in the description of the body which can make the bye-laws, and that "earth-closets" are added in the list of matters, as to which bye-laws may be made. All local boards became in 1872 urban sanitary authorities, so that practically there is no difference between the two Acts in what is material to the present question.

The bye-laws under which the controversy arises came into force in January, 1888. No provision appears in any of the Acts between 1875 and 1888 which affects the present dispute.

It is not necessary to go into the details of the bye-laws. It is sufficient to say that they contain no rules for determining whether the drainage in any particular case shall be by the construction of or by connection with a sewer or by a cesspool. They contain provisions for securing that the building shall have such a level as will enable it to be "effectually drained," and to have "the requisite communication with any sewer into which such drain may lawfully empty." They contain all necessary provisions where the drainage is to be by cesspool, and all necessary provisions if it is to be by connection with an existing sewer, but none which in terms provide for a case like the present. They contain provisions that the building owner shall deposit plans both of new streets and of new houses, showing inter alia "the form and dimensions of every water-closet, earth-closet, privy, ashpit, cesspool, well, and all other appurtenances," and "the intended line of drainage of the buildings and the intended size, depth, and inclination of each drain," and he is also to deposit "a description in writing of the intended mode of drainage."

There is no provision in the bye-laws for the approval of the plans by the defendants, or that any penalty shall be incurred by a person who proceeds to build before he has got such approval. If in building he has contravened any bye-law, he may be made to pull down the work erected in contravention thereof—that is all (see bye-law 99).

By the Public Health Act, 1875, s. 158, where plans are required by bye-laws made by an urban sanitary authority to be laid before that authority "the urban authority shall, within one month after the same has been delivered, signify in writing their approval or disapproval; and if the work is commenced after such notice of disapproval or before the expiration of such month without such approval, and is in any respect not in conformity with any bye-law of the urban authority, the urban authority may cause so much of the work as has been executed to be pulled down" at the expense of the offender.

No provision is made in the Act or in any subsequent Act for the case of plans required by the bye-laws of a rural sanitary authority to be deposited. Nothing can be more unsatisfactory than the phraseology used; and legislation which requires that which is sometimes called a benevolent, but which is really a slovenly, interpretation is greatly to be deprecated. But one is bound I suppose to attribute some intention to legislation of this kind, and it can hardly have been meant to leave out in the cold the cases in which, in the year 1875, the deposit of plans had been required by bye-laws of rural authorities invested under the Act of 1872 with urban powers. There must have been such cases, probably many of them, and I suppose, therefore, that I am justified in saying that for the purposes of section 158 a rural authority so invested is an urban authority, and in that fashion holding that section 158 applies to the present case. If so, and if, as appears to be admitted by the defendants in this case, the applicant has contravened no bye-law, I see no reason why he should not proceed to build. If he contravenes no bye-law in the course of his building, nothing can be done to him that I can see. Indeed, section 158 appears to be framed on the supposition that no consequences will follow from building without waiting for approval or disapproval if no bye-law be contravened. It is true that the section deals in terms only with the power to pull down without an order, but the limitation on that power would be of no value whatever if an order for demolition could be obtained though no bye-law or other enactment were contravened and the section is a very clear intimation of the view of the Legislature. I do not suppose that in face of the provisions of this section the Local Government Board would sanction a bye-law which made the mere building without approval, or even in spite of disapproval, an offence. Such a bye-law would, in my opinion, be, to say the very least, of questionable validity in face of section 158. The whole train of reasoning in the judgment in R. v. The Corporation of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, 60 L. T. N. S. 963, strongly supports this view.

At all events, in the present case there is no such bye-law, and nothing, so far as I can see, to hinder the applicant from building in spite of disapproval, so long as nothing contrary to any enactment is done. In both R. v. Preston, 3 Times L. R. 665, and R. v. Newcastle-upon-Tyne, just cited, it seems to have been assumed that serious consequences would follow from building without approval of the plans. Section 158, however, appears to me to have been framed with a careful regard to the rights of property. It contains provisions of great value, as it ensures that the local authority shall have notice of what is going on or likely to be done; and where bye-laws have been made providing, as they often do, that the building may be pulled down if not in conformity with the deposited and approved plans, which is quite consistent with section 158, a most important security against objectionable construction is attained.

Still, it is a matter of risk for the owner to go on building without approval, and approval ought not to be withheld upon untenable grounds. In the two cases just cited the objections taken by the local authority were in the one case that the proposed building would interfere with a projected street, and in the other that the sort of building proposed was not in keeping with a residential neighbourhood. In each case the court granted a mandamus to approve the plans. In the present case the only objection taken is scarcely more tenable. It is that the plans cannot be approved until the applicant has made provision at his own expense for sewers in the proposed streets and for an outfall sewer. This is to impose upon him a burden which, to the extent to which such works may be necessary, falls by law upon the local authority, whether rural or urban (section 15 of the Act of 1875), and certainly no encouragement ought to be given to put the screw upon the applicant in order to free the respondents at his expense from the performance of a duty cast by law upon them. If there is no other objection, certainly approval ought not to be withheld upon this ground.

The defendants by their counsel object that to approve the plans may commit them irrevocably to very expensive works, which, it seems, are not needed for the rest of the district, but are really wanted for the improvement of the applicant's property, part of which he is proposing to turn into a building estate. They say, and in this they are right, that there is nothing in the mere approval by them of plans showing a large group of streets and buildings to compel the applicant to build the whole or any substantial part of the proposed houses, and that, although the applicant here is the Marquis of Hastings and presumably rich enough to support the large outlay contemplated, he might be a speculative builder without any means other than the general resource of the speculative builder, money expected to be borrowed but very often indeed failing to be raised; that it will be time enough to consider how the drainage is to be dealt with when there is some indication that the scheme will really be carried out; and that by approving the plans they will be committing themselves prematurely to the construction of a definite set of expensive works.

These considerations are not without weight. The bye-laws require that the plans shall show the intended size, depth, and inclination of each drain; and if they do so—which in the present case I doubt, though no such objection has been taken—and the plans are approved, the local authority must make the street sewers so as to accommodate the accepted drains, and the outfall so as to accommodate the street sewers. It would be impossible to sanction depths and levels for drains, which would fix those of the street sewers, without careful consideration of the possible or probable future needs of the rest of the neighbourhood; and the burden on a rural community might be intolerable if, in the end, but a portion of the proposed building scheme should be carried out, after the local authority was practically committed to a system which might have been very different if the original plans had been confined to the houses afterwards in fact erected. The legislation has certainly not directly met such a case; sections 21 and 22 of the Act of 1875 contain the only provisions for connecting houses with sewers and cesspools applicable to rural authorities; section 25 contains further enactments for urban districts with which by section 276 the Local Government Board may by order invest a rural authority; but all these powers together are very imperfect.

The local authority, however, is not without protection, and I am inclined to think in this case adequate protection. Under section 277 they can obtain from the Local Government Board an order constituting the area proposed to be built upon, or any proper modification of it, a special drainage area; in which case the whole of the cost of the new drainage will be thrown upon the area. On the other hand the new area will then be exempt from the drainage rates of the district generally. With this the applicant would be content, and it seems just enough; but the defendants wish to keep the applicant as a contributor in respect of the area in question to the rest of the drainage, and to force him to pay for the discharge of their duties, which is not just or right.

The defendants have a further protection. Should it be worth their while when the new streets to be laid out are completed to take them over, they can compel the applicant or purchasers from him to pay for all the cost of putting the streets into good order to begin with, including the construction of sewers, by getting an order from the Local Government Board under section 276 giving them urban powers in respect of the new streets.

I wish in nothing that I have said to lay down any definite rule as to what matters may be properly taken into consideration by the local authority as grounds for withholding approval of plans. If they contravene bye-laws, though such bye-laws do not relate to mere details of construction, the ground may in my opinion be a good one. If they contravene, or the building when erected would contravene, an Act of Parliament, such a ground may very well be perfectly valid; and I am not at all prepared to say that general considerations of a character analogous to some I have been discussing may not afford valid grounds for withholding approval altogether or temporarily. Each case must be dealt with upon its own merits and according to its own circumstances.

Seeing, therefore, that the defendants have refused their approval of the plans on the ground that the applicant has not provided for what it will be their duty, and not his, to provide for, and on no other ground, I think the mandamus to approve the plans must be granted.

Rule absolute.

REG. v. YORKSHIRE WEST RIDING COUNTY COUNCIL. (a.)

Theatre — Public entertainment — Licence to perform stage plays—Licence granted conditionally on undertaking not to apply for excise licence—Discretion of licensing committee—Theatres Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 68).

On an application for a theatre licence the licensing committee granted it on condition that the applicant did not apply for an excise licence, they being of opinion that there were sufficient public-houses in the immediate neighbourhood.

Held, that the licensing committee had properly exercised their discretion, and that they were justified in taking into consideration the fact that an excise licence might be applied for, and, in view of the facts of the case, in imposing a condition on the granting of the theatre licence.

In this case a rule nisi for a mandamus had been obtained, calling upon the County Council of the West Riding of Yorkshire to show cause why they, as the licensing authority for the public performance of stage plays for the said riding, should not hear and determine an application by one William Ritchie for a licence for the public performance of stage plays in the Princess Theatre, at Hoyland Nether, near Barnsley.

The theatre was erected in 1893, and the then proprietor applied for a theatre licence, and a licence was given him upon his giving an undertaking that he would not apply to the Excise authorities for a licence for the sale of intoxicating liquors, this condition being imposed because there was a public-house within twenty yards of the door of the theatre.

In this way the licence was granted three times.

In 1895 the present applicant became the proprietor, and he asked for a new licence. He was asked whether he would renew the undertaking given by his predecessor, and he replied he would not; thereupon the Licensing Committee refused the licence.

The applicant then offered to give the undertaking, if he could do so without prejudice to an appeal.

The Licensing Committee, under those circumstances, granted the licence, and the applicant then obtained a rule nisi.

The question raised in this case was whether it was within the competence of the Licensing Committee to impose such a condition as they had here done. It was stated that where there was a theatre licence an excise licence could be obtained without a justices' licence.

Asquith, Q.C. (Roskill with him), showed cause against the rule.—6 & 7 Vict. c. 68 provides for the granting of theatre licences by justices. Then by the Local Government Act, 1888, s. 7, such licensing authority was transferred to the county council. 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 39, provides that if a man has a theatre licence he may get an excise licence without also getting a justices' licence. The discretion of the licensing authorities is absolute: Ex parte Harrington, 4 Times L. R. 435. The committee had not exceeded their authority, and had a right to impose conditions: Reg. v. Silvester, 31 L. J. M. C. 93, 10 W. R. C. L. Dig. 2.

Macmorran, Q.C. (F. Low with him), in support of the rule.—The Licensing Committee have no such discretion as they claim, and cannot impose such a condition. What they have done is an usurpation of authority which the Legislature never intended them to have.

CAVE, J.—I am of opinion that this rule must be discharged. It is a little difficult to see, and therefore difficult to lay down, and I do not desire to lay down, what are the rules by which the discretion of the committee is to be guided in this case. It is enough to say that some discretion, at all events, is reposed in the committee; and when it is reposed in the committee it is they who are to exercise the discretion, and not the Court of Queen's Bench. Unless the court can see clearly that they have not exercised their discretion properly, or have allowed considerations which ought not at all to influence them to decide the case, I do not think it is for the court to interfere in the matter.

In this case, however, I can see nothing that can reasonably be taken exception to in the action of the Licensing Committee. It is possible that an objection might have been raised if they had passed a general rule that in no circumstances should a theatre be licensed unless the licensee would undertake not to apply for an excise licence. But that has not been done. In this case it has been left to the committee to have regard to the circumstances of each particular case which comes before them. They had here to consider a variety of circumstances. The necessity of having liquor sold may vary very much, according to the position of the place itself or of the theatre. It is a matter which they might very fairly and properly take into their consideration that there was a place where liquor could be obtained within twenty yards of the theatre itself. I cannot for a moment bring myself to say that they have exercised their discretion wrongly in this matter, and the discretion being reposed in them, and being exercised in a manner which I certainly cannot say was wrong, it seems to me that the application is not supported, and that the rule consequently must be discharged.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. The Lord Chancellor, in the case of Sharp v. Wakefield, 39 W. R. 561, [1891] A. C. 173, at p. 179, lays down very clearly the sort of discretion which is to be exercised in matters of this kind. He says: "And 'discretion' means, when it is said that something is to be done within the discretion of the authorities, that that something is to be done according to the rules of reason and justice, not according to private opinion: Rooke's case, 5 Rep. 100*a*—according to law, and not humour. It is to be, not arbitrary, vague, and fanciful, but legal and regular. And it must be exercised within the limit to which an honest man competent to the discharge of his office ought to confine himself."

Now, applying those principles, is there anything which the County Council have taken into consideration in this matter which is not within those limits—"to which an honest man competent to the discharge of his office ought to confine himself"? It seems to me that the very fact that an excise licence may be got practically as a matter of course if the theatre licence is granted is one of the things that a man who wished to do his duty in this matter could not help taking into consideration. One of the grounds upon which it is well recognized that justices in special sessions may fairly refuse a licence to a public-house is that there are too many in the immediate neighbourhood where the house is proposed to be opened. They refuse the licence very much on the same grounds on which it is refused here—namely, that if the man got the alehouse licence he could get the excise licence as a matter of course. That was a matter which they would take into their consideration. It might as well be said that they had no right to take that into consideration in granting or refusing an alehouse licence. It seems to me that they might perfectly well have taken this view. The grant of this licence will necessarily practically carry with it a licence to sell liquors within the walls of the theatre. There is a public-house already twenty yards off. This is multiplying facilities for drinking in a neighbourhood where it is not safe to do so, and where to do so would probably lead to disturbance and disorder. If that is not a good ground for exercising a discretion, I do not know what can be. Mr. Macmorran has pointed out that the licensing authority may make it very difficult to question what it has done by simply refusing the licence and not saying why they do so. I suppose that was intended as a sort of warning to the County Council in case he should be successful in getting the case sent back to them, that they must not suppose that as a matter of course they can get round a decision against them by simply holding their tongues. I must say in this case I think this particular authority has been perfectly straight about it and told everybody exactly what they meant to do and why they meant to do it, and they come honestly to ask the court whether they were right or wrong in what they did. I think they are right, and therefore this rule must be discharged.

Rule discharged with costs.

THE RHYMNEY IRON CO. (LIMITED) (Appellants) v. FOWLER (SURVEYOR OF TAXES) (Respondent). (a.)

Inland revenue — Income tax — Deductions — Money wholly laid out for purposes of trade—Colliery company — Contributions to Coalowners' Association — Income Tax Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), s. 100, Schedule D, rules applying to the first and second cases, rule 1.

The owners of a colliery were members of a coalowners' association, and paid to the funds of that association certain sums of money in return for which the association indemnified them against losses in case of strikes. In returning the amount of their profits for the purposes of the Income Tax Act, the colliery owners claimed to deduct the yearly average of the excess of their contributions over the amounts received as indemnities.

Held, that the deductions claimed could not be allowed, as the subscriptions paid to the association were not "money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of" the trade carried on by the colliery owners, within the meaning of the first of the rules applying to both the first and second cases in Schedule D, section 1, of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35.

Case stated by the Commissioners of Income Tax.

At a meeting of the Commissioners for the General Purposes of the Income Tax Acts, held at the Police Court, Tredegar, on the 30th of October, 1895, the Rhymney Iron Co. (Limited) appealed against an assessment made upon the company as colliery proprietors under Schedule D of the Income Tax Acts for the year 1895-96, on the ground that in arriving at the profits assessable no deduction had been made for the sums contributed by the company to the Monmouthshire and South Wales Coalowners' Association.

The amount claimed as a deduction was £601 5s., being the yearly average of the excess of their contributions over the amounts received as indemnities during the five years to the 5th of April, 1895.

The appellant company were members of the said association, and paid to the funds thereof the subscription provided for in a deed of arrangement.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The appellants argued that the payments were proper deductions, inasmuch as they were disbursements wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the proper business purposes of the colliery.

Rule 63 shows what subscriptions are payable by members of the association.

Rules 80, 81, 82, and 84 provide for the support by the association of any member by way of indemnity on a scale laid down.

The appellants urged that the subscriptions made to the association should be treated as an insurance against loss caused by labour disputes; that these disbursements were made exclusively for the purposes of the trade, being made solely to secure and indemnify the subscriber against loss or diminution in his general annual receipts.

The Surveyor of Taxes contended that by section 8 of 29 & 30 Vict. c. 36 collieries were to be assessed according to the rules prescribed by Schedule D of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, so far as the same were consistent with the rules laid down in No. III. of Schedule A of the same Act; that the deduction claimed was not admissible, inasmuch as it did not fall within the scope of the deductions allowed by the rules of either Schedule A or Schedule D; that the balance of profits and gains had repeatedly been held in the Exchequer courts to be the difference between the receipts and the expenditure necessarily incurred in obtaining those receipts; that the contributions to the coal-owners' association was purely voluntary, and could cease at the option of the payer, and formed no part of the working expenditure of the colliery; that it had been clearly decided in the case of Watney v. Musgrave, 28 W. R. 491, 5 Ex. D. 241, that the costs and expenses to be deducted from the receipts are merely and only the costs and expenses of production of the articles; that the contributions are of a totally different character from the mere cost of production, and further, that they were not a necessary payment in working the colliery, inasmuch as several colliery proprietors in the district did not subscribe to the association, but still succeeded in carrying on their business.

The commissioners decided that the subscriptions were not admissible as absolutely necessary working expenses of the colliery, and confirmed the assessment.

The question stated for the opinion of the court was, Were the contributions paid to the Monmouthshire and South Wales Coalowners' Association a proper deduction in arriving at the profits of a colliery for income tax purposes?

Asquith, Q.C. (Muir Mackenzie with him), for the appellants.—The company were entitled to make these deductions, for the money paid by them to the association was money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of maintaining the colliery as a going concern, and therefore came within section 100, Schedule D, of the Income Tax Act, 1842.

Sir R. Webster, A.G. (Danckwerts with him), for the respondent.—The payments made to the association were merely voluntary contributions, which might cease at any time. They were not part of the expenses of maintaining the colliery as a going concern. The deductions claimed could not be allowed, as they did not fall within the rules of either Schedules A or D.

Asquith, Q.C., replied.

POLLOCK, B.—I confess that I do not feel any difficulty in deciding this case, although one always has in these cases a feeling that it seems hard on a man, doing what is prudent, that he should not when he comes to face the Income Tax Commissioner be in the same position as if he were facing trustees, or somebody to whom he had to render an account of how money was spent. But that is not the guiding rule in these cases at all. We must go, as has been said before by many judges, by the words of the Act of Parliament, and we must not allow any item in favour of the person who is taxed, merely because it is an item which would properly find its way into a profit and loss account between a man and his partners, or as kept for himself. There are a great many things that a prudent trader might treat as deductions, because he wished to make a fund to provide against future accidents and things of that kind, which are not dealt with at all by the Income Tax Acts.

Now in the present case this institution, which the commissioners themselves say is a very useful one, is an association whereby, according to rule 63, a subscription for every ton is payable by a member. Then by rule 81 "a member shall be paid an indemnity on any deficiency of actual daily output up to and not in excess of the tonnage assured, to be calculated upon an average of the actual output per day." This is not the case of a man who is doing something in order to keep up the colliery as a going concern. It is not like a man who is keeping a reserve, either of working power or of money, for the purposes of working the colliery. It is an indemnity against what may happen from many causes, especially in the case of strike, namely, that the colliery is not working, and while that is so there is a loss—as the learned counsel for the appellants very properly put it, not merely the loss of the daily earning of the colliery, but also of the deterioration of the colliery while it is not being worked, and it may be flooded or injured in other ways. When we come to the words of the deductions disallowed, which are these, "Any disbursements or expenses whatever, not being money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of such trade," it seems to me, without adding to those words, it would be sufficient to say: "This is not money laid out for the purposes of such trade; it is money laid out in order to provide for an unfortunate contingency, by reason whereof the trade cannot be worked." That is a very different thing. It is true that the judges have sometimes said that "expended for the purposes of such trade" means "for the purposes of carrying on such trade." I do not think myself that it is necessary to make that addition in order to come to the conclusion at which I have arrived. I must say this, that not only has the case of Watney v. Musgrave nothing to do with it, but I doubt very much if this case could be brought within the principle of Watson v. The Royal Insurance Company, ante, p. 89, [1896] 1 Q. B. 41, for reasons which I need not now go into.

In the result our judgment must be for the Crown.

BRUCE, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think we cannot extend the words in the first rule "expended for the purposes of such trade" to include expenses incurred to meet the contingency of loss while the trade is not being carried on. I was very much struck at first with the argument of the learned counsel for the appellants when he said the expenses were expenses incurred for the purpose of maintaining the colliery as a going concern, for the maintenance of the machine; but it is not for the maintenance of the machine for the purpose of carrying on the business, but it is for the maintenance of the machine while the business is not being carried on. I do not think we can give that extended meaning to the words.

Appeal dismissed with costs, and judgment for the Crown.

SOUTH STAFFORDSHIRE WATERWORKS CO. v. SHARMAN. (a.)

Detinue—Finding of goods—Title of finder—Rings found in pool—Title of owner of pool as against finder.

Where an owner of land has a de facto possession of the land and an actual control over the same, a chattel found upon or beneath such land is presumed to be in the possession of the owner of the land, who can claim possession of the chattel from the finder.

Appeal by the plaintiffs from the Lichfield County Court.

The action was an action of detinue to recover two gold rings, as the property of the plaintiffs, found by the defendant in the Minster Pool, Lichfield, while the defendant was in the plaintiffs' employment. The plaintiffs claimed the return of the rings or £5 for their value, and £1 damages for their detention.

The plaintiffs were the freeholders of the land covered by the Minster Pool, situate near the Cathedral, Lichfield.

The defendant was employed by the plaintiffs, with about forty other labourers, to clean out the pool, and while the defendant was so employed he found in the mud from the bottom of the pool the two gold rings in question. The plaintiffs demanded the rings, but the defendant refused to deliver them up, but he afterwards placed the rings in the hands of the police, with whom they remained a considerable time. The police endeavoured to find the original owner, but failed to do so, and they afterwards handed the rings back to the defendant from whom they had received them.

The plaintiffs then demanded the rings from the defendant, but the defendant refused to deliver them up, and the present action of detinue was then brought.

It was proved as a fact that there was no special contract between the plaintiffs and the defendant as to giving up any articles that might be found.

For the plaintiffs the cases of Reg. v. Rowe, 7 W. R. 236, 28 L. J. M. C. 128, and Elwes v. Brigg Gas Co., 35 W. R. 192, 33 Ch. D. 562, were cited, and it was contended that the present case was governed by the principles acted upon in those two cases, and the plaintiffs also relied on Pollock and Wright on Possession, pp. 40-41.

The defendant relied on Armory v. Delamirie, 1 Sm. Lead. Cas., 10th ed., p. 343, and Bridges v. Hawkesworth, 21 L. J. Q. B. 75.

The learned county court judge decided, on the authority of Armory v. Delamirie and Bridges v. Hawkesworth, that the defendant had a good title against all the world except the true owner, and he gave judgment for the defendant with costs, with leave to appeal on the terms that the plaintiffs should pay the defendant's costs in any event.

The plaintiffs appealed.

(a) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Bart., Barrister-at-Law.

W. Wills, for the plaintiffs.—The learned judge was wrong in finding for the defendant. The plaintiffs were the freeholders of this land, and they had not only the possession, but the de facto control over the pool and the contents of the pool. Everything found in the pool was therefore presumptively in the possession of the plaintiffs. Armory v. Delamirie does not apply to such a case as this, nor does Bridges v. Hawkesworth apply, as there the bundle of notes was found in a part of the shop to which customers had a right to go. The principles applicable are those laid down in Reg. v. Rowe, where a piece of iron found in a canal was held to be presumptively the property of the canal company; in Elwes v. Brigg Gas Co., where a prehistoric boat found in the soil was held to be in the possession of the freeholder of the soil. [He was stopped.]

Disturnal, for the defendant.—I admit that if there is a de facto control over the place where the article is found the article presumably belongs to the person who has such control. Here, as in Bridges v. Hawkesworth, there was no actual or de facto control by the plaintiffs over the pool or the contents of the pool. The principle therefore laid down in Bridges v. Hawkesworth applies to this case, as well as the same principle laid down in Armory v. Delamirie. The onus is on the plaintiffs, and they have not discharged that onus, and have not shown that the mere ownership of land proves a presumptive ownership of every chattel found on the land.

He also referred to Reg. v. Clinton, Ir. Rep. 4 C. L. 6, 18 W. R. C. L. Dig. 29; and Brew v. Haren, Ir. Rep. 11 C. L. 198, 25 W. R. Dig. 248.

Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—In this case I think the learned judge was wrong, and his judgment must be reversed. The case raises an interesting question. It is no doubt correct that before the plaintiffs can succeed they must show that they had a de facto control over this particular locus in quo and its contents. Can it be said that this pool and its contents were under the control of the plaintiffs? I think they were under the control of the plaintiffs, just as the iron found in the canal in Reg. v. Rowe. I think that the principles on which this case ought to be decided are well laid down in Pollock and Wright on Possession, p. 41: "The possession of land carries with it in general, by our law, possession of everything which is attached to or under that land, and, in the absence of a better title elsewhere, the right to possess it also; and it makes no difference that the possessor is not aware of the thing's existence. So it was lately held concerning a prehistoric boat imbedded in the soil. It is free to anyone who requires a specific intention as part of de facto possession to treat this as a positive rule of law. But it seems preferable to say that the legal possession rests on a real de facto possession, constituted by the occupier's general power and intent to exclude unauthorized interference." That passage is entirely applicable to this case, and it shows the difference between the present case and some of the cases referred to on behalf of the defendant, of things thrown away into a public place or into the sea, where there was not in anyone a real de facto possession or a general power and intent to exclude unauthorized interference. Bridges v. Hawkesworth is a case standing by itself and on its own special grounds, and I think it was rightly decided. There a person had dropped a bundle of banknotes in a shop—in the part of the shop that was open to the public; and it was held that a customer who came in and picked up the bundle was entitled to the notes as against the shopkeeper, and the real ground of the decision is that given by Patteson, J.: "The notes never were in the custody of the defendant" (the shopkeeper) "nor within the protection of his house before they were found." The general principle seems to be this, that where there is possession of a house or land with a manifest intention to exercise control over it, and with actual control over the particular locus in quo, then if a chattel is found on it by a servant or a stranger the presumption is that the thing found belongs to the owner.

For these reasons I think the judgment must be for the plaintiffs.

REG. v. LILLYMAN. (a.)

Criminal law—Rape and indecent assault—Evidence—Particulars of complaint made by prosecutrix—Admissibility.

Upon the trial of a prisoner on a charge of rape or indecent assault or kindred offences against women the particulars of a complaint made by the prosecutrix as soon as possible after the acts complained of may be given in evidence as part of the case of the prosecution for the purpose of enabling the jury to judge whether the conduct of the prosecutrix was consistent with her sworn testimony that the acts complained of were done against her will.

Case stated by Hawkins, J.

The facts and arguments sufficiently appear in the judgment.

J. E. Fox, for the prisoner.

Sir R. Finlay, S.G. (Henry Sutton and Cracroft with him), for the prosecution.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 16.—The judgment of the COURT (Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J., POLLOCK, B., and HAWKINS, CAVE, and WILLS, JJ., was delivered by HAWKINS, J.—The prisoner was tried before me at the Nottingham Assizes upon an indictment containing three counts.

The first charged him with an attempt to have carnal knowledge of one Florence Sevestre Green, a girl above the age of thirteen and under the age of sixteen. The second with an assault on the same girl with intent to ravish her. The third with an indecent assault, also upon the same girl. The girl was examined as a witness in support of these charges and deposed to the acts she complained of having been committed without her consent.

For the Crown, evidence was tendered in chief of a complaint made by the girl to her mistress, in the absence of the prisoner, very shortly after the commission of the acts charged, and it was proposed to ask the witness called for that purpose to state the details of the complaint in the language used by the girl. Counsel for the prisoner (Mr. Fox) objected, first, that the complaint could not be given in evidence at all; and, secondly, that even if the fact of a complaint having been made was admissible, the particulars of it could not be elicited in the examination in chief. I overruled both objections, and the complaint with full particulars was deposed to by the witness. The jury found the prisoner guilty on the first count only. That, however, does not affect the question we have to decide, because, although to establish guilt upon that count it was not essential to prove want of consent, yet, as the girl had emphatically stated that whatever was done was against her will, the reason which, in our opinion, as it will appear, made the complaint evidence upon the second and third counts were equally applicable to the first. It is necessary, in the first place, to have a clear understanding as to the principles upon which evidence of such a complaint, not on oath, nor made in the presence of the prisoner, nor forming part of the res gestæ, can be admitted.

It clearly is not admissible as evidence of the facts complained of; those facts must therefore be established, if at all, upon oath by the prosecutrix or other credible witness. And, strictly speaking, evidence of them ought to be given before evidence of the complaint is admitted.

The complaint can only be used as evidence of the consistency of the conduct of the prosecutrix with the story told by her in the witness box, and as being inconsistent with her consent to that of which she complains.

In every one of the old text-books proof of complaint is treated as a most material element in the establishment of a charge of rape or other kindred charge. In Hawkins' Pleas of the Crown, book 1, c. 41, s. 3, it is said: "It is a strong but not a conclusive presumption against a woman that she made no complaint in a reasonable time after the fact"; and in Blackstone's Commentaries, vol. 4, c. 15, p. 211, referring to the time when Bracton wrote, in Henry the Third's reign, it is said: "But in order to prevent malicious accusations it was then the law that the woman should immediately after, dum recens fuerit maleficium, go to the next town and there make discovery to some credible persons of the injury she has suffered." Later on, at p. 213, it is said: "And first the party ravished may give evidence upon oath, and is in law a competent witness; but the credibility of her testimony, and how far forth she is to be believed, must be left to the jury upon circumstances of fact that occur in that testimony. For instance, if the witness be of good fame, if she presently discovered the offence and made search for the offender . . . these and the like are concurring circumstances which give greater probability to her evidence. But, on the other side, if she be of evil fame and stand unsupported by others; if she concealed the injury for any considerable time after the opportunity to complain; if the place where the fact was alleged to be committed was where it was possible she might have been heard and she made no outcry, these and the like circumstances carry a strong but not conclusive presumption that her testimony is false or feigned."

It is too late, therefore, now to make serious objection to the admissibility of evidence of the fact that a complaint was made, provided it was made as speedily after the acts complained of as could reasonably be expected.

We proceed to consider the second objection, which is that the evidence of complaint should be limited to the fact that a complaint was made, without giving any of the particulars of it.

No authority binding upon us was cited during the argument either in support of or against the objection. We must therefore determine the matter upon principle. That the general usage has been substantially to limit the evidence of the complaint to proof that the woman made a complaint of something done to her, and that she mentioned in connection with it the name of a particular person, cannot be denied; but it is equally true that judges of great experience have dissented from this limitation, and of those who have adopted the usage none have ever carefully discussed or satisfactorily expressed the ground upon which their views have been based.

Rex v. Brazier, decided in 1779, is the earliest authority I propose to cite as throwing any valuable light upon the subject. Before that case there existed an impression in the minds of some of the judges that, although a child incapable of understanding the nature and obligations of an oath was not a competent witness, nevertheless, upon a charge of rape or assault with intent to commit that crime, she might and ought to be heard without oath to give the court information, and that upon such unsworn information the accused person might be convicted. In Rex v. Brazier, tried before Buller, J., and reported in East P. C. 443, and Leach C. C. 199, that learned judge went still further, and admitted as evidence such information on the testimony of third persons to whom it was first given. There the prisoner was indicted for an assault with intent to commit a rape upon a girl under seven years of age. The girl herself, by reason of her then presumed incompetency to be sworn, was not produced as a witness on the trial; inasmuch, however, as she had on the afternoon of the day on which the outrage was charged to have been committed immediately on her coming home made a statement to her mother (though not in the presence of the prisoner) of the full particulars of the alleged assault, her mother was allowed to prove this statement, and it was left to the jury as evidence of the facts complained of, and practically upon it the prisoner was convicted. The case was afterwards twice considered by the judges. Upon the first occasion two of them (Gould and Willes, JJ.) expressed a view that the girl's statement was admissible as part of the transaction itself. This view was not, however, adopted by the rest of the judges; and on the second occasion they were all unanimously of opinion that no testimony whatever could legally be received except upon oath,* and that no evidence on oath of the commission of the crime having been given, the evidence of the girl's statement to her mother ought not to have been received. This case, therefore, in effect decided that the mere complaint is no evidence of the facts complained of, and that the admissibility of the evidence of the complaint is dependent upon proof of the facts by sworn or other legalized testimony. It is obvious, however, that upon the assumption that the complaint was admissible in evidence, it was in the case referred to admitted with all its details.

When and for what reason the proof of the complaint was first limited to answers to such questions as these: "Did she make a complaint?" "Did she mention a name?" "Whose name?" &c., I have not been able to discover. Rex v. Clarke, 2 Stark. 243, is cited in several text-books on criminal evidence as an authority that in proving the complaint the particulars of it cannot be given in evidence, but the ruling of Holroyd, J., certainly does not go to that extent. That learned judge ruled, indeed, that the fact of the woman having made a complaint was admissible in evidence, as also was a description of her state and appearance at the time; but he did not rule that the particulars of such complaint could not be given in evidence; he only ruled, and in our opinion correctly ruled, that they were not evidence of the truth of her complaint or the statements of fact on which it is based. In this sense the ruling is cited in 1 Phillips on Evidence, p. 204, and in this sense we adopt it as settled law. That case is clearly not an authority for the limitation of the evidence of the complaint.

In Reg. v. Walker, 2 Moo. & Rob. 212 (1839), on the trial of a person for assaulting a female with intent to commit a rape, Parke, B., permitted a relative of the woman to whom she had made immediate complaint to give evidence generally that such complaint was made, but refused to allow the witness, on examination in chief, to state the particulars of it, upon the ground that according to the usage which had then obtained such particulars should not be given, but that it should be left to the prisoner's counsel to bring the details of the complaint before the jury if he thought fit so to do. It is clear, however, that the learned Baron did not approve of such usage, for he prefaced his ruling by saying: "The sense of the thing certainly is that the jury should, in the first instance, know the nature of the complaint made by the prosecutrix and all that she then said; but for reasons which I could never understand the usage has obtained."

Reg. v. Megson and Others, 9 C. & P. 420 (1840), was an indictment against the prisoners for a rape on a woman who had since died without having made any admissible deposition which could be laid before the jury. That she had been ravished by somebody was beyond all question. On the part of the prosecution it was sought to put in evidence a detailed account of the transaction in the shape of a complaint by the woman with a view by it alone to show the prisoners to be the guilty persons. Rolfe, B., rejected it, saying: "There is a wide difference between receiving such statements as confirmatory of the prosecutrix's credibility in a charge of rape on which she is examined as a witness, and a case like the present where the complaint made is to be received as independent evidence." In summing up he added: "In ordinary cases of rape, when a witness describes the outrage in the witness-box, evidence of her complaint soon after the occurrence of the outrage is properly admissible to show her credit and the accuracy of her recollection." This case is in our opinion improperly cited as an authority for excluding the particulars of the complaint. We look upon it only as a ruling that the particulars could not be used as independent evidence of the facts alleged, to the same effect as was, according to our interpretation, the ruling in Rex v. Clarke. The last few words of the summing up rather indicate that Baron Rolfe's view was that for the purpose of confirmation merely the details ought to be given. How otherwise, one might well ask, could the "woman's credit and the accuracy of her recollection" be tested by it?

Reg. v. Guttridge and Others, 9 C. & P. 471 (1840), was a very similar case. The prosecutrix was absent when the trial took place. It was sought to put in her complaint made on the following day after the alleged outrage. Parke, B., thought it safer to reject the evidence on the ground that it was not part of the res gestæ, but only confirmatory, evidence which could not be used as the prosecutrix had given no evidence. There is nothing in that case to suggest that the learned baron intended to rule that if evidence of the complaint were admissible the particulars ought to be excluded.

In Reg. v. Osborne, Car. & M. 622 (1842), on an indictment for rape, the prosecutrix on oath stated that soon after the alleged outrage, and as she was returning home, she made complaint to a Mrs. Partridge who was called as a witness to confirm her statement. The counsel for the prosecution was allowed to ask, "Did the prosecutrix make any complaint?" to which the answer was, "Yes." He was then allowed to ask, "Did she name any particular person?" to which she also said, "Yes." It was then proposed by the counsel to ask, "Whose name was mentioned?" To this it was objected that the question was inadmissible, upon the ground that though the fact of the complaint was admissible as showing the prosecutrix was not then an assenting party, the name was an important particular as against the prisoner, and therefore could not be asked; and the ruling of Pattison, J., in the case of Rex v. Wink, 6 C. & P. 397 (hereafter referred to), was cited in support of the objection. In support of the question it was urged that the whole complaint was admissible as part of the res gestæ. Creswell, J., ruled that the statement of the prosecutrix did not form part of the res gestæ (treating Rex v. Wink as a direct authority against the question). In this ruling we agree, but if it had been pressed upon that learned judge that the complaint in all its detail was nevertheless a fact admissible for the purpose of showing consistency of conduct on the part of the woman we doubt if he would have rejected the evidence. At all events the case cannot be taken as a ruling upon the point now under discussion, for the decision was founded entirely upon the statements not being part of the res gestæ.

In support of the view that all the particulars of a complaint are admissible, it was pointed out that the late Sir James F. Stephen, in his digest of the law of Evidence, note 5 to article 8, says: "I heard Willes, J., rule that they were on several occasions, vouching Parke, B., as his authority." And, after saying that Bramwell, B., had been in the habit of admitting the whole of the complaint, he adds his own view that such practice "is certainly in accordance with common sense." Two reported cases were brought to our attention in which such view was acted upon. In Reg. v. Eyre, 2 F. & F. 579 (1860), tried before Byles, J., on a trial for rape, the prosecutrix being examined in chief was asked whether she had made any complaint, and what she said. To an objection made by the prisoner's counsel Byles, J., said: "Whatever she said immediately after the occasion and what was said to her in answer is equally evidence." The latter part of this ruling is open to question. In Reg. v. Frederick Wood, 14 Cox. 46 (1877), tried before Bramwell, L.J., at Chester, the prosecutrix gave evidence that the prisoner came to a room in an inn where she was barmaid when she was alone, committed a rape upon her, and then left the house, and that an hour and a half afterwards a customer came in to whom she made a complaint, mentioning the prisoner's name in connection with it. It was proposed for the prosecution to ask her what she said to the customer and his reply. Bramwell, L.J., said: "I shall admit the conversation; you give evidence of a complaint being made and use the name of the prisoner, leaving it to the jury to infer that the girl said that he had committed the offence we are now trying him for; I do not see why you should not give in evidence all she said when she did so complain, leaving it to the jury to judge of the value of such testimony." The girl then told in minute detail the particulars of all that had, as she alleged, been done to her by the prisoner and the customer's replies to her story. This customer was also called, and spoke again in detail as to the complaint.

I am not aware of any other cases directly bearing upon the question before us. Many others were cited, all of which we have examined; but finding they were decided upon other principles of the law of evidence than that which governs the present case, and that they render no assistance to us in our consideration of it, we abstain from any discussion or expression of opinion upon them.

After very careful consideration, we have arrived at the conclusion that we are bound by no authority to support the exising usage of limiting evidence of the complaint to the bare fact that a complaint was made, and that reason and good sense are against our doing so. The evidence is admissible only upon the ground that it was a complaint of that which is charged against the prisoner, and can be legitimately used only for the purpose of enabling the jury to judge for themselves whether the conduct of the woman was consistent with her testimony on oath given in the witness-box—negativing her consent and affirming that the acts complained of were against her will—and in accordance with the conduct they would expect in a truthful woman under the circumstances detailed by her. The jury, and they only, are the persons to be satisfied whether the woman's conduct was so consistent or not. Without proof of her condition, demeanour, and verbal expressions, all of which are of vital importance in the consideration of that question, how is it possible for them satisfactorily to determine it? Is it to be left to the witness to whom the statement is made to determine and report to the jury whether what the woman said amounted to a real complaint? And are the jury bound to accept the witness's interpretation of her words as binding upon them without having the whole statement before them, and without having the power to require it to be disclosed to them, even though they may feel it essential to enable them to form a reliable opinion? For it must be borne in mind that if such evidence is inadmissible when offered by the prosecution the jury cannot alter the rule of evidence and make it admissible by asking for it themselves.

In reality, affirmative answers to such stereotyped questions as these: "Did the prosecutrix make a complaint?" (A very leading question, by the way.) "Of something done to herself?" "Did she mention a name?" amount to nothing to which any weight ought to be attached; they tend rather to embarrass than assist a thoughtful jury, for they are consistent either with there having been a complaint or no complaint of the prisoner's conduct. To limit the evidence of the complaint to such questions and answers is to ask the jury to draw important inferences from imperfect materials—perfect materials being at hand, and in the cognizance of the witness in the box. In our opinion nothing ought unnecessarily to be left to speculation or surmise.

It has been sometimes urged that to allow the particulars of the complaint would be calculated to prejudice the interests of the accused, and that the jury would be apt to treat the complaint as evidence of the facts complained of. Of course, if it were so left to the jury they would naturally so treat it. But it never could be legally so left, and we think it is the duty of the judge to impress upon the jury in every case that they are not entitled to make use of the complaint as any evidence whatever of those facts, or for any other purpose than that we have stated. With such a direction we think the interest of an innocent accused would be more protected than they are under the present usage. For when the whole statement is laid before the jury they are less likely to draw wrong and adverse inferences, and may sometimes come to the conclusion that what the woman said amounted to no real complaint of any offence committed by the accused. Moreover, the present usage and consequent uncertainty in practice (for the usage is not universal) provokes many objections to the evidence on the part of the prisoner's counsel, and these are generally looked upon with disfavour by the jury; and the very object of confining the evidence of the complaint to the few stereotyped questions we have referred to is often defeated by a device, not to be encouraged, by which the name of the accused, though carefully concealed as an inadmissible particular of the complaint, is studiously revealed to the jury by some such question and answer as the following: "In consequence of that complaint did you do anything?" "Yes, I went to the house of the prisoner's mother, where he lives, and accused him." This seems to us to be an objectionable mode of introducing evidence indirectly which if tendered directly would be inadmissible. We are aware that Pattison, J., is reported in Rex v. Wink, 6 C. & P. 397 (1834), to have suggested that such a mode of obtaining the evidence might be adopted; but we cannot help thinking that there must be some inaccuracy in the report, and the suggestion did not meet with the approval of Creswell, J., in Rex v. Osborne, 2 C. & K. 624, nor of Brett, J., in Reg. v. Taylor, 13 Cox. 77 (1875), nor can we approve of it.

In the result our judgment is that the whole statement of a woman containing her alleged complaint should, so far as it relates to the charge against the accused, be submitted to the jury as a part of the case for the prosecution, and that the evidence in this case was therefore properly admitted.

The conviction must be affirmed.

WHITTAKER v. "SCARBOROUGH POST" NEWSPAPER CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Practice—Discovery—Interrogatories—Libel in newspaper—Circulation of newspaper.

In an action for libel against the proprietors of a newspaper the plaintiff delivered an interrogatory asking the number of copies printed and circulated of the issue of the newspaper containing the alleged libel. The defendants answered that a considerable number of copies were printed and published.

Held, that the answer was sufficient.

Parnell v. Walter, 38 W. R. 270, 24 Q. B. D. 441, overruled.

Appeal from an order made by Collins, J., at chambers.

The action was brought against the defendants, the proprietors of the Scarborough Post, for damages for an alleged libel published in their newspaper. The place of trial was Leeds.

The plaintiff delivered an interrogatory asking the defendants what was the number of copies printed and circulated of the issue of the Scarborough Post containing the words complained of.

The defendants answered that a "considerable number" of copies were printed and published.

The judge, affirming the master, made an order for a further and better answer, but gave leave to appeal.

The defendants appealed.

Montague Lush, for the defendants.—The judge at chambers felt bound by the decision in Parnell v. Walter, 38 W. R. 270, 24 Q. B. D. 441, to make an order for a further answer. That case, however, was wrongly decided. It is absurd to ask by an interrogatory as to the circulation of the Times. That case was disapproved in Rumney v. Walter, 40 W. R. 174. Here the action is to be tried at Leeds, and the answer, even if the interrogatory required an answer, is sufficient.

Scott Fox, for the plaintiff.—The defendants are bound to state approximately what the circulation of the issue of their newspaper that contained the libel was. A Leeds jury can have no knowledge of the circulation of the Scarborough Post, a local newspaper in a seaside watering place. An interrogatory as to the circulation of the Times or other well-known newspaper may be unreasonable; but the principle, though wrongly applied in Parnell v. Walter, applies in the case of small local newspapers.

He referred to James v. Carr, 7 Times L. R. 4.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—This is an action of libel against the proprietors of a newspaper. Now if a libel is a serious one, the jury will give substantial damages though it may be published only a small number of times. If, on the other hand, the jury are of opinion that the libel is of such a character that it ought to be treated with contempt, though published very widely, they will probably give contemptuous damages. In Parnell v. Walter interrogatories as to the circulation of the Times were allowed, interrogatories which, as Mathew, J., said in Rumney v. Walter, were frivolous and ridiculous. It is said, however, that a jury at Leeds will not know anything about the circulation of the Scarborough Post. But Scarborough is a large and important watering place, frequented by Yorkshire people. The plaintiff has not ventured to swear that in his belief a jury at Leeds can know nothing about the circulation of the Scarborough Post. We cannot lay down that in no case can an interrogatory as to the circulation of a newspaper be put. But if Parnell v. Walter is a decision that such an interrogatory can be put in every case, even in an action against the Times or other known London or provincial newspaper, it is a wrong decision. The interrogatory there was a frivolous and vexatious one, and did not require an answer. The plaintiff comes here relying upon the decision in Parnell v. Walter, and asks for a further and better answer to the interrogatory. In my opinion the answer is sufficient.

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The object of interrogatories is to enable a party to dispense with the proof of some fact which may be admitted, or to obtain information which the other party alone can give. How can a further answer to this interrogatory be material? The Scarborough Post is published at Scarborough, and the action is to be tried at Leeds. The answer to the interrogatory admits that a considerable number of copies of the newspaper were printed and published. It is said that a further answer is necessary to enable the jury to assess the damages. Before interrogatories could have been administered at common law, a plaintiff could not have obtained information from the defendants about the circulation of the newspaper except of the vaguest kind, such as is given here. As regards the decision in Parnell v. Walter, the trial was to take place in Middlesex for the sole purpose of assessing the damages, and it does seem to me impossible to say that the jury in the place where that action was to be tried would not have sufficient knowledge of the circulation of the Times without being told the approximate number of the copies printed and published. Therefore I should have said that no answer whatever would have been material in that case. But I do not say the same of all newspapers of merely local circulation. I can conceive a case where a jury would have the vaguest possible knowledge of the circulation of a newspaper. The present case relates to a Scarborough newspaper, and the trial is to take place at Leeds, and I think that a jury at Leeds will have sufficient knowledge of the circulation of the newspaper. But if not, the answer says that the circulation is considerable, and I cannot conceive why any further answer should be given.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I venture to say that before 1890, when Parnell v. Walter was decided, such an interrogatory as in that case was never allowed. With all respect for the learned judges who decided that case, I cannot conceive a more ridiculous question. The plaintiff in an action of libel against the Times does not require to have the circulation of the Times on a particular day, and if he got the information he would not read it to the jury. It is known that the circulation of the Times is very great. In my opinion Parnell v. Walter was wrongly decided. Speaking for myself, I think that primâ facie such an interrogatory as this should not be allowed at all in actions of libel against newspapers. In my opinion the judge at chambers should say that such an interrogatory is not wanted in the case of well-known newspapers. In Rumney v. Walter and James v. Carr the right view was taken of Parnell v. Walter, and it is obvious that the court in those cases would not have made the order but for Parnell v. Walter. The real truth is that damages in an action of libel are not given for the number of publications, but for the gravity of the libel. I agree that there may be a publication of a libel in a newspaper no one knows anything about, and I do not say that the judge may not allow an interrogatory in such a case to show that the newspaper has some circulation, but such cases are rare. Here the defendants say that the circulation is considerable, and in my judgment that answer is more than sufficient.

CHADDOCK v. BRITISH SOUTH AFRICA CO. (a.)

Practice—Discovery—Interrogatories—Company—Leave to interrogate member—Notice of application—Ord. 31, r. 5.

Where a company is a party to an action, notice of an application for leave to deliver interrogatories to a member of the company under ord. 31, r. 5, must be served upon the member.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal from an order made by Collins, J., at chambers.

The plaintiff applied at chambers for an order for leave to deliver interrogatories to the defendant company, to be answered by Rutherfoord Harris, the secretary of the company in South Africa, or for leave to deliver interrogatories to Rutherfoord Harris, a member of the defendant company. No notice of this application was served upon Harris. A question having arisen at chambers as to whether Harris had resigned the office of secretary, the judge—affirming the master—made an order for leave to deliver interrogatories, to be answered by "the proper officer of the defendant company," and refused to make an order for leave to deliver interrogatories to Harris personally as a member of the company, upon the ground that he had not been served with notice of the application.

The plaintiff appealed.

Arnold Statham, for the plaintiff.—An order should be made directing Harris to answer the interrogatories, as he knows more about these matters than anyone else. The plaintiff is the person to suggest by whom the interrogatories should be answered. If Harris has resigned the secretaryship, he can be required to answer as a member of the company. Ord. 31, r. 5, does not require notice of the application to be given to him, and in Berkeley v. Standard Discount Co., 28 W. R. 125, 13 Ch. D. 97, notice of the application was not served upon the member. The proper course, as adopted in that case, is for the member, if he objects to the order, to apply to rescind the order giving leave to interrogate him.

Lord Robert Cecil, for the defendants.—The order is in proper form. If Harris is still the secretary and is the "proper officer" to answer the interrogatories, he will have to answer. If Harris is asked to answer as a member of the company, then notice of the application ought to be given to him.

Arnold Statham replied.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The plaintiff, having brought an action against the company, proposes to interrogate the company, and for that purpose he may ask for an order to deliver interrogatories to any member or officer of the company. The plaintiff asks to interrogate the company through a member or officer. It is a matter of discretion whether an order for leave to interrogate shall be made. When an application is made to interrogate a company by its secretary, inasmuch as it is the secretary's duty to know all the affairs of the company, I do not think that notice of the application should be given to him. But when an application is made to interrogate a company through a member of the company, as the member cannot be presumed to know all about the affairs of the company, and may or may not have the requisite knowledge, and as an order upon him personally to answer the interrogatories will put him under considerable liabilities, it is a fair rule to lay down that he should have notice of the application. The order may compel him to undertake a long inquiry, which is the business of the secretary, and not of a member; and therefore I think that notice of the application should be given to the member. It is a good rule to adopt, and the judge has a right to insist upon its observance. The plaintiff here is insisting that Harris is still the secretary of the company in South Africa. If he is still secretary, the order will compel him to answer the interrogatories. In my opinion the learned judge, in the exercise of his discretion, as there was a dispute whether Harris was still the secretary, was right in making the order in the form in which he made it. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Ord. 31, r. 5, differs from section 51 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, in the addition of the word "member." The plaintiff asks for leave to deliver interrogatories to the company to be answered by Rutherfoord Harris, their secretary in South Africa, or for leave to deliver interrogatories to Rutherfoord Harris, a member of the company. As regards the first part of the order, it does not seem to me to be necessary to give notice of the application to Harris, as the application is to deliver interrogatories to the defendant company, to be answered by Harris, the secretary. There is a dispute whether Harris has resigned the office of secretary. How can the judge at chambers decide that question? It seems to me that this order is very carefully drawn—namely, that the company should answer by its proper officer. If Harris is the secretary, he would seem to be the most proper officer to answer. But the plaintiff asks for an order that Harris should answer, and therefore the second part of the application was put in. This part of the application is for leave to deliver interrogatories to Harris, not to the company, and Harris will have to answer them in his individual capacity. Harris has not been served with notice of this application, nor is he represented before us. In my opinion he should be served with notice of the application. If he were here, he might say that he knew nothing of the affairs of the company.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I agree. The plaintiff applies to interrogate the company by Harris, their secretary. A dispute arose whether Harris is still the secretary of the company. The judge at chambers could not try that issue, and so he confirmed the order of the master, and ordered interrogatories to be delivered to the company, to be answered by the proper officer of the company. It may be that Harris is not the proper person to answer. That being so, the plaintiff asks for an order upon Harris to answer the interrogatories personally as a member of the company. The objection taken to that part of the application is that notice of the application should be served upon him before such an order is made. In my opinion that objection is well founded.

Appeal dismissed.

BATES v. DONALDSON. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Covenant not to assign without consent—Consent not to be unreasonably withheld—Reasonable grounds for withholding consent.

A lease granted by the plaintiff's predecessor in title contained a covenant by the lessee not to assign without the written permission or licence of the lessor, such permission or licence not to be unreasonably withheld in the case of any respectable and responsible assignee. The plaintiff, being desirous of taking possession for himself, entered into negotiations with the lessee for a surrender of the lease. The lessee offered to sell the lease for £400. The plaintiff did not immediately close with this offer, and in the meantime the lessee agreed to sell the lease to the defendant for £400. The plaintiff, while admitting that the defendant was a respectable and responsible person, refused to give his licence for an assignment of the lease to him, on the ground that he himself was willing to give the sum of £400 for the lease.

Held, that this was not a reasonable ground for withholding consent to the assignment.

Appeal from a judgment of Mathew, J., at the trial of an action without a jury.

The action was brought by Sir Edward Bates to recover possession of the premises, No. 14, Cavendish-square. A lease of the premises had been granted by the plaintiff's predecessor in title, W. A. Stanford, to Mrs. Wilson for a term of fourteen years from the 29th of September, 1888. The lease contained a covenant by the lessee not to "assign or underlet the premises without having first obtained a written permission or licence signed by the said lessor, such permission or licence not to be unreasonably withheld in the case of any respectable and responsible person who may be the proposed assignee or under-tenant." The lease also contained a power of re-entry in case of any breach of covenant by the lessee.

In 1895 the plaintiff, understanding that Mrs. Wilson was willing to sell the house, and desiring to obtain possession for himself, entered into negotiations with her through an agent for a surrender of the lease by her to him. Mrs. Wilson offered to sell the lease for £400, but the plaintiff did not immediately close with this offer. On the 7th of February, 1895, the agent, having obtained authority from the plaintiff to accept the offer, called upon Mrs. Wilson for that purpose. Mrs. Wilson had, however, earlier on the same day signed an agreement to sell the lease to the defendant for £400.

The plaintiff, on being applied to for his licence for the assignment of the lease to the defendant, refused to grant it. The defendant brought an action against Mrs. Wilson for specific performance of her agreement, and, having obtained a decree, went into possession.

The plaintiff thereupon brought this action on the ground that there had been a breach of covenant which entitled him to re-enter. It was admitted by the plaintiff that the defendant was a respectable and responsible person.

Mathew, J., gave judgment for the defendant.

The plaintiff appealed.

Channell, Q.C., and C. A. Russell (Sir Edward Clarke, Q.C., with them), for the plaintiff.—The learned judge was wrong in holding that the plaintiff withheld his licence unreasonably. The wording of the covenant shows that, even if the proposed assignee is a respectable and responsible person, there may be a reasonable ground for refusing to consent to the assignment. The reasonable ground in this case is that the plaintiff desired to have the house for himself, and was willing to give the same sum of money for the lease as the proposed assignee was willing to give. If the tenant had wished to assign the lease to her son or to some friend, the case would have been different. But it is not unreasonable for the landlord to get an advantage for himself, so long as he does not put the tenant to any disadvantage.

They cited Barrow v. Isaacs & Son, 39 W. R. 338, [1891] 1 Q. B. 417; Lehmann v. M'Arthur, 15 W. R. 877, L. R. 3 Ch. App. 496; and Treloar v. Bigge, 22 W. R. 843, L. R. 9 Ex. 151.

Bucknill, Q.C., and J. Mulligan, for the defendant.—The plaintiff withheld his assent unreasonably. A reasonable ground for withholding assent under this covenant must be some objection either with regard to the proposed assignee himself or with regard to his probable use of the premises.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 20.—KAY, L.J., read the following judgment:—This is an action of ejectment by a landlord to recover possession of No. 14, Cavendish-square, for breach of covenant by the tenant. The covenant in question, contained in a lease for fourteen years from the 29th of September, 1888, was not to assign "without having first obtained a written permission or licence signed by the said lessor, such permission or licence not to be unreasonably withheld in the case of any respectable and responsible person who may be the proposed assignee." It is plain on the face of that covenant that it is not sufficient that the proposed assignee should be a respectable and responsible person. The words clearly show that the landlord may nevertheless have some reasonable ground for refusing his consent. I shall not attempt to give any exhaustive definition of what would be in every conceivable case an unreasonable withholding of permission.

The only question which it is necessary to consider is whether in the circumstances of this case the refusal was reasonable within the meaning of this covenant. Counsel admitted, and I agree, that if the proposed assignee intended to use the house for some purpose to which the landlord might reasonably object, though such purpose was not forbidden by the lease nor by any rule of law, the landlord might reasonably refuse to permit the assignment. So I should think there might be other reasons, personal rather to the landlord than the tenant, which might justify his refusal under the terms of the covenant. In this case the plaintiff bought the interest of the original lessor with the intention, he says, of leaving the house to his wife, if she survived him, for herself and his grandchildren to live in after his death. With this object he negotiated with the lessee, Mrs. Wilson, to purchase her interest, and his agent obtained Mrs. Wilson's consent to sell her interest for £400. Not having received any further communication from the plaintiff, five days later Mrs. Wilson agreed to sell her lease to the defendant Donaldson. She did not communicate her intention to do this to the plaintiff, and of course she did not obtain his consent. She did not ask for it. She has no reason for preferring Donaldson to the plaintiff. All that she wants is to get rid of the lease and to get £400 for her interest. The plaintiff says that he has always been willing to give her £400, and he admits that he wishes to compel her to sell it to him, and that this is the reason why when an application was made for his written consent after the contract to sell to Donaldson he refused to give it. It is obvious that if the plaintiff had a right to refuse his consent, that right cannot be taken away or affected by anything done by the lessee before she asked for it. Donaldson has obtained a decree for specific performance against her. That cannot alter the rights of the plaintiff in any way. The sole question is, Was the plaintiff unreasonable in refusing his consent at the time when he was asked to give it? As the proposed assignee in this case is a respectable and responsible person, the plaintiff must show a strong reason for withholding his consent. Clearly it is not sufficient for him to say, "I want to oblige the lessee to sell to me." He must at least be able to show that at the time when the consent was refused, if that was his motive, the refusal did no harm to the lessee. I cannot find that before or at the time when the plaintiff refused his consent he had offered to buy the lessee's interest for £400 or any sum. He does not allege in his pleading that he did so. He does not offer to do so in his pleading. The plaintiff is therefore in the position of asserting simply that he is entitled to eject the defendants Mrs. Wilson and Donaldson because they have not got his written permission. That is not the contract. The lessee had a right to assign without his permission if he withheld it unreasonably. Was it reasonable to refuse without making any offer to buy for himself? If he had answered the request for permission by saying, "I was in treaty with you to buy, and was ready to give the price you asked, and I now offer it to you," the case might have been different, but that at least he ought to have done. He did nothing of the kind. On the contrary, his excuse for refusing permission was that he believed the purchaser intended to carry on at the house his business of a picture dealer, and it was only when this failed that the plaintiff set up the plea on which he now relies. On the whole, I am of opinion that the refusal was under the circumstances unreasonable, and that this appeal should be dismissed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J., read the following judgment:—This is an action of ejectment brought by Sir Edward Bates against Mr. Donaldson, and the question is, What is the meaning of the phrase that "permission to assign shall not be unreasonably withheld" in a clause in a lease? In the year 1889 Sir Edward Bates purchased of Mr. Stanford the reversion of 14, Cavendish-square, expectant upon the determination of a lease theretofore granted to Mrs. Wilson which expires in 1902. In the year 1895 Sir Edward became desirous of obtaining possession of these premises, and through an agent negotiated with Mrs. Wilson for the surrender by her to him of her lease. Mrs. Wilson asked £400 for her unexpired term. The agent was not authorized by Sir Edward Bates to accept this offer, and some days elapsed before he obtained authority from Sir Edward to agree to pay this amount to Mrs. Wilson. In the meantime she, having no contract with Sir Edward that he would give what she asked, on the 7th of February, 1895, entered into a contract with Mr. Donaldson to assign to him the residue of her term for £400. Sir Edward, as it turns out, would have given Mrs. Wilson the £400 which she asked, but when she contracted with Mr. Donaldson she did not know this. It is now admitted that Mr. Donaldson is in every way a respectable and responsible person, and that no objection can be made to him personally, nor is it suggested that he is about to use 14, Cavendish-square, in any improper or undesirable manner.

On the 11th of February, 1895, application was made to Sir Edward Bates for his licence to assign to Mr. Donaldson, and Sir Edward took exception to Mr. Donaldson as an assignee, and ultimately on the 28th of February, 1895, declined to give his assent. It must now, however, be taken that the sole reason he had for refusing his assent was because he wanted possession of the house himself, and he now seeks to eject Mr. Donaldson, who has entered into possession of the house, upon the ground that the following covenant in the lease to Mrs. Wilson has not been complied with by her. It is this: "That the lessee shall not nor will assign or underlet the demised premises for the whole or any part of the term hereby granted without having first obtained a written permission or licence signed by the lessor, such permission or licence not to be unreasonably withheld in the case of any respectable and responsible person who may be the proposed assignee or under-tenant." There is in the lease a power to re-enter in case of breach of any of the covenants therein. It will be seen that it is only when a respectable and responsible person is proposed as assignee or under-tenant that this clause—as to the permission not being unreasonably withheld—comes into play. If the person proposed be not a respectable and responsible person, the lessor has an absolute right to refuse permission; if, however, the person proposed be respectable and responsible, then the lessor cannot unreasonably withhold his permission. This stipulation as to the permission not being unreasonably withheld (if a respectable and responsible person is obtained) releases the lessee from the covenant not to assign without permission if the permission is unreasonably withheld, and this was so held in Treloar v. Bigge.

Now, what is an unreasonable withholding of permission within the meaning of this clause? It is conceded by Mr. Channell, who appeared for Sir Edward Bates, that if a tenant was desirous of assigning to a friend, it would be unreasonable for the lessor to withhold his assent for the purpose of breaking the lease; but, it was said, if it was not to a friend, but to a stranger, and the lessor was willing to pay what the lessee wanted and as much as he could get from a stranger, it was not unreasonable to withhold his assent in order, if possible, to break the lease, if he wanted the premises for himself. This is not my reading of the clause. It is admitted that there is no case in the books which covers the present. Now, when the lessor granted the lease he parted with his interest in the premises for the entire term. The tenant during that term can assign to any respectable and responsible assignee, in which case the lessor is bound not to unreasonably withhold his permission. It is not, in my opinion, the true reading of this clause that the permission can be withheld in order to enable the lessor to regain possession of the premises before the termination of the term. This clause was inserted, in my judgment, alio intuitu altogether, and in order to protect the lessor from having his premises used or occupied in an undesirable way or by an undesirable tenant or assignee, and not in order to enable the lessor to, if possible, coerce a tenant to surrender the term so that the lessor might obtain possession of the premises, which was the reason why in the present case the assent was withheld. For these reasons I think that Mathew, J., came to a right conclusion, and that this appeal must be dismissed with costs. The Master of the Rolls agrees with the judgments which have been delivered.

Appeal dismissed.

Married woman—Settlement—Post-nuptial settlement—Covenant to settle after-acquired property—Real estate at law or in equity—Mistake—Relief in court of equity—Fines and Recoveries Act, 1833 (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 74), ss. 1, 77—"Future interests"—Malins' Act (20 & 21 Vict. c. 57), s. 1—Power of Divorce Court to vary settlements—Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Acts (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, s. 45, and 22 & 23 Vict. c. 61, s. 5).

In 1877 a married woman by a deed, separately acknowledged by her, covenanted to settle any real and personal property which might thereafter be devised or bequeathed or descend or devolve to or upon her.

Held, that such covenant was void as to both classes of property, for section 77 of the Fines and Recoveries Act did not apply to that which at the date of the deed of covenant was a mere possibility or expectation at some future time of an estate or interest in land; and Malins' Act (20 & 21 Vict. c. 57) did not apply to a mere expectancy in personal estate; the words in that Act, "every future interest" meaning an interest to which the married woman at the date of the disposing deed has some existing title at law or in equity.

Where, on the 24*th of April*, 1894, a decree was made by the Divorce Court for the variation of a marriage settlement by reason of the divorce of the wife for adultery, and such decree proceeded upon a common mistake of both the husband and wife as to what property of the wife was comprised in the settlement;

Held, that a court of equity could grant relief to the divorced wife in respect of such mistake, but would only do so upon her undertaking to consent that any application to the Divorce Court under section 45 of the Divorce Act, 1857 for a further settlement upon the husband and child of the marriage, should be dealt with in all respects as if it had been made before the 24*th of April*, 1894, and was being considered by the court on that day.

The plaintiff, Georgiana Augusta Konarski, was married to the defendant Waldegrave Charles Fearn Kell on the 6th of May, 1873. There was issue of the said marriage one child only—i.e., the defendant Vernon Kell, who attained his majority in 1894. No settlement or agreement for a settlement was made before or upon the said marriage. By a post-nuptial settlement acknowledged by Mrs. Kell in accordance with the requirements of the Fines and Recoveries Act, dated the 12th of June, 1877, and made between the defendant W. Kell and the plaintiff, then his wife, of the one part, and George Lucas and S. P. L. Konarski (the trustees of the settlement) of the other part, the plaintiff settled upon the trusts therein mentioned (the same being trusts of the usual nature) her share in the residuary personal estate of her uncle, James Lucas, deceased. The plaintiff further covenanted to bring into settlement any real or personal estate of the value of £500 or upwards from any one source, which should be devised or bequeathed or descend to or devolve upon or vest in the plaintiff or in the defendant W. Kell in her right.

At the date of the said post-nuptial settlement the only property to which the plaintiff was entitled was the following—that is to say, (1) an absolute interest as one of his next of kin in a share of the personal estate of the said James Lucas (who died on the 19th of April, 1874), such share being then believed to be one-fifteenth, but ultimately turning out to be two forty-fifths; (2) an interest under an appointment made by the will of Harriet F. Konarski (who died in 1871), the plaintiff's mother, in certain personal estate then in court in a suit Lucas v. Lucas, such interest being contingent on the plaintiff surviving the expiration of twenty years from the 24th of April, 1871, or previously dying leaving issue then surviving, but as to one moiety of such interest subject to a preceding life interest therein vested in Samuel Konarski, the father of the plaintiff; (3) an interest under the marriage settlement of her father and mother, dated the 24th of April, 1840, and under an appointment in execution of a power contained in that settlement made by her mother's will in certain personal estate comprised in such settlement, subject to a preceding life interest therein vested in her father; (4) an absolute interest in real and personal estate under the will of George Lucas, who died on the 7th of June, 1890; (5) the one-fourth share of her father's real and personal estate on his death intestate in January, 1893.

Of the original trustees of the settlement of 1877, S. P. L. Konarski died on the 11th of December, 1887, and George Lucas died on the 7th of June, 1890; and by an indenture, dated the 8th of May, 1891, the defendants C. W. Murray and Thomas Lupton were duly appointed new trustees of the said settlement jointly with the defendant E. L. Walker.

On the 3rd of May, 1893, a decree nisi was made by the Divorce Court for the dissolution of the marriage between the plaintiff and the defendant Waldegrave Kell. Such decree nisi was made upon the petition of the defendant Waldegrave Kell, by reason of the adultery of the plaintiff with James Allcard. The decree nisi was made absolute on the 13th of November, 1893. On the 18th of November, 1893, the plaintiff married James Allcard, whose wife she now is. No settlement or agreement for a settlement was made before or upon such marriage. On the 5th of December, 1893, the defendant Waldegrave Kell presented a petition in the said divorce proceedings praying that the settlement of the 12th of June, 1877, might be varied in manner therein mentioned. It set out in paragraph 6 thereof the funds then alleged to be subject to the trusts of the settlement, including a sum of £4,344 Consols which had come to the hands of the trustees after the decree nisi had been made. Paragraphs 7, 8, and 9 set out certain funds which had not then come to the hands of the trustees, but which Mrs. Kell was entitled to; and in paragraph 10 it was stated that "the funds, shares, and interests mentioned in paragraphs 7, 8, and 9 hereof will be subject to the trusts of the said indenture of settlement of the 12th of June, 1877." Mrs. Kell, then Mrs. Allcard, put in an answer to the petition, and she thereby either expressly admitted or at all events did not dispute the allegations in the petition as to the property subject to the trusts of the settlement, and in particular paragraph 10 was not disputed. The petition was referred to the registrar for report, and in the proceedings before the registrar Mrs. Kell brought in certain proposed terms of settlement which were by the consent of all parties embodied in the report of the registrar dated the 24th of April, 1894. Such report stated (inter alia) that the income arising from the funds then subject to the trusts of the said settlement of the 12th of June, 1877, amounted to about £820 per annum, and that with the consent of the petitioner and the respondent it was proposed that the court should order that the trustees or trustee for the time being of the said settlement should out of the income arising from the trust funds comprised therein during the joint lives of Mr. and Mrs. Kell pay to Mr. Kell £300 per annum, and to their only son, Vernon Kell, £150 per annum from the 10th of July, 1894, and on the death of either Mr. or Mrs. Kell, and during the lifetime of the survivor pay to the said Vernon Kell £300 per annum in lieu of the said sum of £150 per annum. The registrar expressly reported that the said Vernon Kell was not separately represented on that application, but that it did not appear that on the whole his interests under the settlement of the 12th of June, 1877, would be prejudicially affected. An order varying the settlement in accordance with the report was made on the 24th of April, 1894. At the date of the decree nisi sums amounting in round figures to £25,000 had been paid to the trustees of the settlement in respect of interests of the plaintiff which at that date were vested in possession in her or in Mr. Kell in her right. Between the dates of the decree nisi and the decree absolute sums amounting in round figures to £6,000 were also paid to them. Sums amounting to about £18,500 were still payable in respect of the plaintiff's interests in the estates of her father and James and George Lucas.

The writ in this action was issued on the 2nd of May, 1895, and the plaintiff thereby claimed declarations to the following effect: (1) That all the funds transferred to the trustees of the settlement subsequent to the date of the decree nisi were the absolute property of the plaintiff; (2) that the share of the plaintiff in the real estate of her father was not subject to or affected by the settlement; and (3) that all the funds which had not yet come to the hands of the trustees of the settlement in respect of the plaintiff's interests in the personal estates of her father and James and George Lucas were not subject to or affected by the settlement.

No question was raised as to the sums, amounting to £25,000, which came to the hands of the trustees before the date of the decree nisi, and it was further admitted by counsel for the plaintiff that in the event of the plaintiff's claim to the other funds proving successful she was bound to elect, and that in the event of her electing to take adversely to the settlement (as was her intention) the surplus income of the £25,000 admitted to be effectually settled, after providing for the annual sums of £300 and £150 directed to be paid to Mr. Kell and his son by the order of the 24th of April, 1894, ought to be applied to make good what may be lost by any parties disappointed by the plaintiff's election. On behalf of Mr. Kell and his son it was admitted by their counsel that down to the 8th of April, 1895, all parties proceeded on the footing that the settlement of 12th of June, 1877, was binding on the plaintiff.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Ashworth James, for plaintiff. —At the date of the settlement (1877) the plaintiff was a married woman; therefore she could not bind her property by contract, nor could she convey or assign interest which she then had either in possession or reversion. The dissolution of the marriage between her and her husband dates from the decree nisi, not from the final decree: Wilkinson v. Gibson, 15 W. R. 983, L. R. 4 Eq. 162. The distinction between the decree nisi and the decree absolute is clearly laid down in Prole v. Soady, 16 W. R. 445, L. R. 3 Ch. App. 220. The effect of these two cases is to prove that this settlement is a nullity excepting so far as regards the property reduced into possession before the decree nisi. This contract, then, was a void contract, not a voidable one, consequently it was not capable of being ratified. In order to bind the plaintiff's property a new settlement was required, and the resettlement made by order of the Divorce Court is not a new settlement. There was nothing in the divorce proceedings which could bind the plaintiff by way of estoppel, and there has been no compromise of a doubtful right. With respect to the funds paid to the trustees since the decree nisi, they hold them in trust for the plaintiff. The plaintiff has the right to intercept all funds which have not yet reached the hands of the trustees. She must elect whether she will affirm or repudiate the settlement so far as funds reduced into possession previous to the decree nisi are concerned. There was no reduction into possession of her interest under George Lucas' will, although his executor was one of the trustees of the settlement: Baker v. Hall, 12 Ves. 497; Wall v. Tomlinson, 16 Ves. 413.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and H. Terrell, for the trustees of the settlement.

Buckley, Q.C., and A. & B. Terrell, for Waldegrave Kell and his son Vernon.—It is necessary to consider what power the wife had in law to deal with her various kinds of property. Upon her father's intestacy she became entitled to land as well as personal property, and under George Lucas' will to the proceeds of the sale of real estate. This entails a consideration of the Fines and Recoveries Act. Section 77 of that Act enables a married woman to dispose of lands of any tenure, and also any estate which she or her husband in her right may have in any lands of any tenure. The definitions given in the Act of the words "land and estate" were designed to include every possible description of real estate or interest in real estate: Briggs v. Chamberlain, 11 Hare, 69 (see Woods, V.C., at p 74). The personal estate of the wife was bound by Malins' Act (see sections 1 & 2). The words "future interests" in section 2 is to be contrasted with the words "reversionary interests," and includes everything to which you are not entitled at present. They mean not only interests which are "future" as regards the enjoyment thereof, but also as regards the right and title thereto. Whatever a married woman does under the Act she does as effectually as if she were a feme sole, and a disposition under the Act will bind property if when you come to select you can identify it: Tailby v. The Official Receiver, 37 W. R. 513, 13 App. C., 523. As to the meaning of the word "dispose," see Pride v. Bubb, 20 W. R. 220, L. R. 7 Ch. App. 64; Crofts v. Middleton, 4 W. R. 439, 8 De G. M. & G. 192 (at p. 212). As to the meaning of "disposition," see Carter v. Carter, ante, p. 73, [1896] 1 Ch. 62. Disposition, under the Fines and Recoveries Act and Malins' Act, is satisfied by what the wife did here. With respect to the money received by the trustees since the decree nisi, she cannot now recover them. Prole v. Soady is not in point, as in that case no money was actually received. In Wilkinson v. Gibson the fund was not settled at all. Here there is a settlement, and the funds were not paid to the trustees under a mistake. At any rate, if they were paid under a mistake, it was a mistake of law and the wife cannot recover them: Bate v. Hooper, 3 W. R. 639, 5 De G. M. & G. 338; Skyring v. Greenwood, 4 B. & Cr. 281. If we are wrong on these points, we contend that there has been a new settlement. Mr. Kell filed a petition to vary the post-nuptial settlement of 1877. That was compromised, and the result was a new settlement made by order of the Divorce Court, the terms thereof being agreed between the parties. The Divorce Court gets its power to deal with these funds from the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), s. 45, and the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859 (22 & 23 Vict. c. 61), s. 5; see Milne v. Milne & Fowler, 19 W. R. 1118, 2 P. & D. 295. [STIRLING, J., referred to Benyon v. Benyon, 15 P. & D. 54, 38 W. R. Dig. 71.]

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., in reply.—The Fines and Recoveries Act does not apply. She, being a married woman, had no power to contract, but only to dispose, and she had no real estate at the date of the settlement. Malins' Act does not apply to funds in possession, nor to future interests which arose under instruments executed prior to the date of the Act. Neither does it apply to interests arising under intestacies. There is no general power in, nor was it the object of, the Act to enable a married woman to bind mere expectancies of interests. Again, there is no consideration for the settlement. That, however, is not of any consequence, as she had no power to make it. This is not an action to recover a debt, but to recover specific property received under a mistake. There is no difference between a mistake of fact and a mistake of law so long as the interests of third parties are not affected: Huddersfield Banking Co. v. Henry Lister & Son, 43 W. R. 567, [1895] 2 Ch. 273; Cooper v. Phibbs, 15 W. R. 1049, L. R. 2 H. L. 149; Jones v. Clifford, 24 W. R. 979, 3 Ch. D. 779. The trustees admit that they hold these funds as trustees, and the plaintiff says that they hold them as trustees for her. There was no new settlement or compromise. The order of the 24th of April, 1894, was the operative thing. The plaintiff does not object to a further application to the Divorce Division, and will not raise any question of jurisdiction.

Buckley, Q.C.—The mistake here was a mistake of law, not a mistake of fact, and ignorantia juris non excusat. The cases cited by Mr. Cozens-Hardy were mistakes of fact, not of law.

STIRLING, J., stated the facts as above set out, and continued:—This settlement was not made in pursuance of any ante-nuptial contract. Whatever binding effect it has must be derived either from the Fines and Recoveries Act or from Malins' Act. First, as to the Fines and Recoveries Act. The plaintiff was not entitled to any real estate at the date of the settlement, but she did become so entitled on the death of her father in 1893. Is this real estate bound by the covenant to settle after-acquired property? The Fines and Recoveries Act only enables a married woman to settle an estate at law or in equity in real estate; and I do not think in 1877, when this post-nuptial settlement was made, that the plaintiff's interest in her father's estate could be so described. She had at the best but an expectation that at some future time she might become entitled to some estate or interest therein. Next, as to Malins' Act, which enables a married woman to dispose of property to which she may be entitled under any instrument made after the 31st of December, 1857. Of the five interests (specifically mentioned above) of the plaintiff, the first and fifth arose under intestacies, while the second and third arose under instruments made before the 31st of December, 1857. Consequently none of these four interests could be disposed of under this Act. The fourth interest arose under the will of George Lucas, dated the 23rd of May, 1890; and it is contended this is a "future interest" within the meaning of the statute. I am of opinion that it is not; but merely a possibility or expectation of interest, and not an "interest" either at law or in equity, nor a "future interest" within the meaning of the Act, which I think contemplated a future vested interest: Davis v. Angel, 10 W. R. 722, 4 De G. F. & J. 524, and Re Parsons, 38 W. R. 712, 45 Ch. D. 51, 57.

Therefore I think that so far as the plaintiff is concerned the settlement of the 12th of June, 1877, and the covenant to settle after-acquired property are void, and not merely voidable, and therefore incapable of being simply affirmed by the plaintiff when she ceased to be under disability. It is said that the proceedings in the Divorce Court for a re-settlement amount to the making of a new settlement, and that she, so far as her property was concerned, being then in the position of a feme sole, is bound by that settlement. Now the re-settlement was made on the assumption by all parties, that the funds specified above were or would be subject to the trusts of the settlement of 1877. I think that assumption was incorrect. It is said, however, that this was a mistake of law, and that relief cannot be given in respect of it. In my opinion this is not so. The maxim ignorantia juris haud excusat is used in respect of the ordinary law of the land, not of a "private right," and here the mistake was one which related to the existing rights and interests of private individuals: Cooper v. Phibbs. Moreover, it was laid down by Turner, L.J., in Stone v. Godfrey, 5 De G. M. & G. 90, 2 W. R. Dig. 12, that "this court has power to relieve against mistakes at law as well as against mistakes of fact," and this was again recognized in Rogers v. Ingham, 25 W. R. 338, 3 Ch. D. 351. The mistake was made on the occasion of the Divorce Court dealing with the petition to vary the existing settlement. The power of that court so to deal is derived from the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Act of 1859 (section 5), but such powers only apply to "property settled" on the marriage or prior to the divorce of the parties. Now the order of the Divorce Court was made on the assumption that all the plaintiff's property was subject to the trusts of the settlement of 1877, and it only deals in terms with the funds therein comprised. I think it is clear that none of the parties intended to deal with any funds not so comprised or to make a new settlement. The income of the £25,000 admittedly comprised in the settlement is sufficient to provide for the annual sums of £300 and £150 directed to be paid by the order of the 24th of April, 1894, and if the case rested there I should be of opinion that nothing had happened to deprive the plaintiff of her right to relief, at all events, so far as the £18,500 (which had not on that date reached the trustees' hands) is concerned.

The case, however, does not rest there, for under the Divorce Act of 1857, s. 45, it is provided that the court after a decree for divorce or separation in consequence of the adultery of the wife (the case here) may direct such a settlement to be made out of the wife's property in possession and reversion as to it may seem good; and it is clear that the court would have been asked by Mr. Kell and his son to exercise these powers on their behalf if they had known that the property of the plaintiff was not subject to the post-nuptial settlement of the 12th of June, 1877, and it is possible that the court would have given Mr. Kell more than £300 a year, and would have required a further settlement to be made for the benefit of the son. Therefore I think, under the circumstances, if the plaintiff is to obtain the relief for which she asks, that the Divorce Court should have an opportunity given to it of exercising the powers conferred upon it by the Act of 1857; and as it is in my power to impose terms upon the plaintiff (for she comes here seeking equitable relief), I declare that the plaintiff's title to relief in respect of the £18,500 still outstanding is made out, she on her part undertaking (as a term of such relief) that any application to the Divorce Court for a further settlement out of the funds to which this action relates shall be dealt with by that court in all respects as if such application had been made prior to the 24th of April, 1894, and were being considered by the court on that day.

There remains the question of the funds which came to the trustees' hands after the decree nisi. I think Mr. Kell's right to deal with the plaintiff's property ceased when the decree nisi was made (Wilkinson v. Gibson, Prole v. Soady). Sums amounting to over £10,000 have been paid to the trustees with the knowledge of the plaintiff since the decree nisi, under a mistake as to the existing rights of the parties. I cannot see that any rights of third parties have intervened, or that anything else has happened to preclude the plaintiff from relief, and I think that upon the same undertaking as before that relief ought to be given.

MACKEOWN v. BOUDARD PEVERIL GEAR CO. (a.)

Company—Shares—Contract to take shares—Prospectus—Rescission—Non-disclosure of material facts.

A person who has contracted to take shares in a company cannot avoid his contract on the ground that the prospectus did not set forth all the material facts pro and con. which might induce a person to apply or not apply for shares. A misstatement or concealment in a prospectus which will be sufficient to avoid the contract must be of such a character as to make the prospectus as it stands misleading.

Trial of action.

This was an action in which the plaintiff, Dr. W. A. Mackeown, of Belfast, claimed rescission of a contract to take thirty-five shares in the defendant company on the ground of misleading statements contained in the prospectus of the said company. The facts of the case were as follow.

The defendant company was registered in the year 1894, with a capital of £40,000, afterwards increased to £45,000, divided into 4,500 shares of £10 each, and having for its objects the acquisition and working of certain patented inventions of one Marcus Boudard relating to the driving gear of cycles, and known as the "Boudard Peveril Gear."

In October, 1894, a prospectus was issued, on the faith of which the plaintiff, according to his statement of claim, applied for the shares.

This prospectus, after describing the invention of the gear, stated that "within a few weeks of each other the following exciting, and at the time unheard-of performances, took place, showing how much cycling will be changed by the advent of the Boudard Peveril Gear. All the following were officially timed by official timekeepers of the Roads Record Association."

The prospectus then set forth certain records or performances in cycling—viz., "Edinburgh to London," which race was described as "faster than the world's previous fastest record," "fifty miles Polytechnic C.C.," "fifty miles world's record," and "100 miles world's record," of which it was stated that this had been lowered by the Boudard tandem, which travelled "faster than the fastest cycle had ever been known to travel"; and "Land's End to John o' Groat's."

This list was followed immediately by the statement: "Such extraordinary performances are sufficient to prove that every rider to whom speed is an object will be bound to have it"—i.e., the Boudard Peveril Gear.

The prospectus continued: "Of course the records quoted are by no means final. Such velocity has been and will be increased, and the true merits of the new Boudard system are therefore all the more likely to be clearly seen and appreciated."

The plaintiff, in his statement of claim, asserted that these statements had been made for the purpose of inducing persons to believe, and had as a matter of fact induced the plaintiff to believe, that it had been proved that such additional speed could be obtained by a cycle fitted with the Boudard Peveril Gear over that obtained by a cycle not so fitted that any rider to whom speed was an object would be bound to have such gear; that the cycle trade would be revolutionized by the introduction of the Boudard Peveril Gear; and that accordingly the shareholders in the defendant company would derive large profits therefrom.

It appeared on the evidence that, while the statements of the prospectus contained a correct account of performances which had actually taken place, some at least of the performances described had been beaten, and had therefore ceased to be records before the issue of the prospectus. The prospectus also set forth a time table showing the alleged gains in speed attained over various distances by the use of a Humber bicycle with Boudard higher speed in 1894, as compared with a Humber bicycle without Boudard speed in 1891.

The plaintiff submitted that such table was intended to produce the belief, and did in fact induce him to believe, that the gains in speed so shown were wholly attributable to the Boudard Peveril Gear, whereas they were attributable to other improvements on the Humber bicycle.

The defendants denied that the time table was intended to induce such belief.

In his lordship's opinion the plaintiff's evidence was not altogether satisfactory. The plaintiff stated that he did not know much about bicycling, but applied for the shares under the belief that the records were still existing records. In cross-examination he admitted that the statement as to the records in the prospectus was not the only thing that induced him to apply for shares. It was shown that he was a competent business man, and well acquainted with the working of companies.

C. E. E. Jenkins, for the plaintiff. — The defendants in this action cannot escape by saying that the untrue statements in their prospectus are merely so much puffing. The principles to be followed in such a case as the present is that laid down in the New Brunswick, Canada, Railway Co. v. Muggeridge, 9 W. R. 193, 1 Dr. & Sm. 363. That case was approved in Central Railway Co. of Venezuela v. Kisch, 15 W. R. 821, L. R. 2 H. L. 99, at p. 113. A prospectus ought, as was stated in that case, to be characterized by the utmost candour. Such statements as those in the present prospectus are traps for unwary investors. [ROMER, J.—It is not enough that something is not stated. There must be such a suppression of material facts as to render the prospectus misleading. His lordship referred to Heyman v. European Central Railway Co., L. R. 7 Eq. 154, 17 W. R. Ch. Dig. 85.] There has in this case been such a material suppression of facts as to make the prospectus misleading.

Neville, Q.C., and P. Wheeler, for the defendants.—The prospectus does not as a matter of fact set forth that the records were existing records. The use of the words "at the time unheard-of performances" show that they were not existing records. The plaintiff, as his cross-examination showed, put a wrong construction on the prospectus; and if it was the fact, as he says, that he applied for his shares on this misconstruction, this will give him no right to rescind. The mere fact that certain things are not stated in a prospectus will not make it misleading, unless such omission materially alters other facts stated. All that this prospectus meant to state was that the invention of the Boudard Peveril Gear would greatly improve bicycling.

C. E. E. Jenkins replied.

ROMER, J.—In my judgment no sufficient case has been shown to entitle the plaintiff to have his contract to take shares rescinded. Mr. Jenkins, who has argued the case for the plaintiff very well, at first complained of the prospectus generally, saying it was of too laudatory a character—particularly in attributing the records set out in the prospectus too much to the merits of the gear, and not sufficiently to the merits of the riders, the improvements made in cycling machines from 1891 to 1894, and the improvements in the tracks. But in the absence of any distinct misrepresentation in the prospectus, and of any improper concealments in any respect, this was not sufficient to justify the plaintiff in repudiating the contract. The plaintiff was a clever man, and had previously been acquainted with public companies, and it is impossible to conceive that he can have been deceived by the quality of puffing common to this and other prospectuses, or can have believed that the performances referred to were entirely owing to the gear. Nothing in the evidence induces me to believe that the gear was not of considerable merit, or that the performances recorded were not to a great extent due to the merits of the gear. In fact, these merits seem to have had a great deal to do with the performances in question. Has there, then, been such a misrepresentation or concealment of facts as will entitle the plaintiff to the relief claimed? In my judgment there was no misrepresentation in the prospectus, because it is clear that all the records and events stated in it did in fact take place as stated.

But it has been contended on behalf of the plaintiff that the prospectus also represented that the performances had never been excelled between the time when they took place and the time when the prospectus was issued. There is nothing in the prospectus that in my opinion amounts to such a statement. It is clear that the records were only referred to as being extraordinary at the time when they were made. This is shown, for example, by the fact that the statement of performances was prefaced by the following words: "Within a few weeks of each other the following exciting, and at the time unheard-of, performances took place." Then, dealing with the ride from Edinburgh to London, the prospectus only described it as being "fasterthan the world's previous fastest record." [His lordship proceeded to comment on other records referred to in the prospectus, and continued:] On page 3 of the prospectus there was a statement which, though curiously phrased, was not difficult to understand. It was as follows: "Of course the records quoted are by no means final. Such velocity"—clearly meaning the velocity which led to the records—"has been and will be increased, both on old and new gear"; and then followed a statement of the merits of the particular gear, the inference being that when the gear was again tried it would again establish a record. It was perhaps not unnatural that the plaintiff, when he was in the box, argued rather than gave evidence; but there is a great difference between the statements of a man like the plaintiff arguing in the box as to what he thought the prospectus meant, and what his impression actually was when he first read it, and I am not satisfied that when he first read the prospectus he did give to it the meaning which he seeks now to place upon it, or that he thought that the words "the records quoted are by no means final" meant what he now said that he understood them to mean. There was, in fact, no misrepresentation. But it was then said that the non-statement in the prospectus of later performances on cycling machines entitled the plaintiff on that ground alone to relief. Counsel for the plaintiff, however, put the case far too high. When there is no question of misrepresentation it is impossible to state broadly that a contract to take shares can be rescinded because the directors of the company in the prospectus have not stated all the material facts pro and con which might induce a person to apply for shares or abstain from so doing. It is impossible to say that any prospectus is misleading merely because all the material facts are not set out.

In some cases to set out such facts a whole volume would be required, and to require such a statement would make the issuing of all prospectuses dangerous. The statement that a person was entitled to relief on the ground of mere non-disclosure in the prospectus must be qualified by restricting the statement to cases in which the facts not disclosed were such that the omission to disclose them rendered the prospectus, as it stood, misleading. I cannot find any such omission in this case, and I am not satisfied that the absence of any statement as to the further performances rendered the prospectus misleading. The plaintiff is not entitled to relief, and consequently his action must be dismissed, with costs, except as to certain matters as to which the defendants refused to make admissions. These costs the defendants must pay.

Action dismissed.

Practice—Appeal—"Practice and procedure"—Garnishee order—Judicature Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 16), s. 1, sub-section 4.

An appeal from an order of the judge at chambers affirming an order of the master making absolute a garnishee order is a matter of practice and procedure within section 1, sub-section 4, of the Judicature Act, 1894, and the appeal therefore lies to the Court of Appeal, and not to the Divisional Court.

Appeal by the garnishee from an order of Pollock, B., at chambers, affirming an order of the master making absolute a garnishee order attaching a debt due from the garnishee to the judgment debtor.

Rufus Isaacs, for the plaintiff, took the preliminary objection that the appeal was a "matter of practice and procedure" within section 1, sub-section 4, of the Judicature Act, 1894, and that the appeal therefore lay to the Court of Appeal, and not to the Divisional Court.

F. Dodd, for the garnishee, contended that the appeal would finally determine the rights of the parties. The case did not come within sub-section 4.

M'Harg v. Universal Stock Exchange, 43 W. R. 464, [1895] 2 Q. B. 81, was referred to.

THE COURT (CAVE and WILLS, JJ.), held that the Divisional Court had no jurisdiction to hear the appeal.

COUNTY COUNCIL OF MIDDLESEX (Appellants) v. THE ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE OF ST. GEORGE'S UNION, IN THE COUNTY OF LONDON (Respondents). (a.)

Poor law—Rating—Occupation—Sessions house—Building used partly for Crown purposes and partly for county council administrative purposes—Proportionate rateability—Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 67)—Local Government Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41).

A sessions house used partly by a county council for administrative purposes, and partly for Crown purposes as the sessions house and for other judicial business, is rateable for poor and other rates and assessments under the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, so far as it is used for local administrative purposes, and so far as it is used for Crown purposes it is not so rateable.

Special case.

This was a case stated pursuant to section 40 of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, by order of Cave, J.

The question raised related to the rateability for poor and other rates and assessments under the above Act of a building known as "The Sessions House" or "Guildhall," Westminster.

The premises were inserted in the supplemental valuation list of the united parishes of St. Margaret and St. John the Evangelist, Westminster, in the St. George's Union in the county of London, made and deposited under the aforesaid Act on or about the 31st day of May, 1894. The entry in the said list relative to the said premises was as follows:—

Number of assessment—407.

Name of occupier, name of owner; Sir Richard Nicholson, clerk of the Council—The Middlesex County Council.

Description of property—That part of the Guildhall, Westminster, being the county hall, committee rooms, offices, office of the county surveyor, vaults, and rooms used by the caretaker, and such parts of the building as are used by the Middlesex County Council for administrative purposes as distinguished from Crown purposes.

Situation of property—Broad Sanctuary.

Gross value—£225.

Rateable value—£188.

The appellants duly objected before the Assessment Committee of St. George's Union, the respondents, pursuant to the said Act, to the said assessment and valuation; and failing to obtain redress duly appealed, pursuant to the said Act and the Local Government Act, 1888, to the Court of Quarter Sessions for the County of London.

The following facts were set out in the case:—

(5) The old Sessions House at Westminster was erected by commissioners appointed under 18 Geo. 3, c. 72; 39 Geo. 3, c. 82; 44 Geo. 3, c. 61; and 47 Geo. 3, ss. 11, c. 67, and upon a site acquired under those Acts. The said old Sessions House was subsequently managed and maintained until the passing of the Local Government Act, 1888, under the said Acts and 7 & 8 Vict. c. 71 (the Middlesex Sessions Act, 1844).

(6) In the year 1777 the site of the Sessions House and the buildings thereon were rated or assessed to the poor rate at the annual value of £188, and were inserted in the land tax assessment books in 1806 at the rate of £101 5s., and assessed in the sum of £20 5s.; and in 1806 at the rate of £93 15s., and assessed in the sum of £18 15s. The land tax was redeemed in 1892. In the year 1892 and from 1845 to 1892 (inclusive) the property was inserted in the land tax assessment books at the rate of £365, and was in 1892 assessed in the sum of £3 16s. 0½d. The sums assessed varied throughout the period 1845 to 1883 (inclusive); but during 1884-92 (inclusive) it was £3 16s. 0½d. In the year 1892 the appellants took the opinion of counsel, who advised that the appellants were not liable to the tax; but as the question might be litigated the Council were advised, having regard to the smallness of the amount, that it would be less expensive to redeem the tax.

(7) Prior to the Local Government Act, 1888, for a period during which the cellars under the Sessions House were let to a wine merchant, the said cellars were assessed and rated to the poor rate. Except as aforesaid, the Sessions House was never before the making of the said supplemental list assessed or rated to the poor rate, or any other rate.

(8) Prior to the commencement of the Local Government Act, 1888, the Sessions House was used for holding courts of assessment sessions and quarter sessions, and for the other judicial business of the justices of the county, and for the public business of the county of Middlesex conducted in or out of sessions by the justices of the county. The courts were also lent when not required for the county business for sittings of the superior courts at Westminster, and for holding arbitrations, wreck inquiries, and other public inquiries of a judicial or quasi-judicial character; for such use a small fee was charged to meet the cost of cleaning, &c., after user, and such fee went to the resident housekeeper.

(9) After the passing of the Local Government Act, 1888, the apportionment of the property and liabilities was made between the county of Middlesex and the newly created county of London, as required by and pursuant to sections 40 (6) and (7) and 62 (1) of that Act; and upon such apportionment, by order of the commissioners appointed by section 61 of the said Act, and dated the 12th day of April, 1892, the Guildhall with its fixtures, fittings, furniture, and effects as it stood on the 1st day of April, 1889, was apportioned to the county of Middlesex. In fact, from the 1st day of April, 1889, by arrangement, it was used for the purposes of the county of Middlesex, and the Clerkenwell Sessions House and the offices of the Metropolitan Board of Works in Spring-gardens were used for the purposes of the county of London.

(10) The accommodation existing at the Guildhall being insufficient for the public, judicial, and administrative business of the county of Middlesex, additions were made to the old Sessions House. No other offices have been provided by the Middlesex County Council. . . . All the alterations and additions were made either within the ancient building or upon the ancient site. The premises were used partly for the administrative business of the County Council, and partly for the purposes of or in connection with the quarter sessions.

The questions for the opinion of the court were:

(a) Is the said Guildhall, or any and what part thereof, rateable and within the description of rateable property the subject of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869?

(b) Upon what principle is the said Guildhall, or any rateable part thereof, to be valued and assessed for the purpose of the poor or other rates?

(c) Is the question whether the parts of the building used by the County Council exclusively are capable of being let separately from the rest of the building material?

(d) Is the value at which the assessment (if any) of the Guildhall or any and what part thereof is to be made limited by any and which of the sums mentioned in paragraph 6 of this case, or by any and what proportion thereof, or limited in amount upon any and what other principle?

Danckwerts, for the appellants.

Bosanquet, Q.C., and W. C. Ryde, for the respondents.

CAVE, J.—It appears to me that there is really very little to be said upon this case, either on the one side or on the other. The decisions, and especially the decisions of late years, starting with the Mersey Docks case, 21 W. R. 913, L. R. 8 Q. B. 445, have taken a very different view of rateability from that which was formerly taken, and the distinction has been drawn, and for a very good reason, between Crown purposes or Imperial purposes, and purposes of local government; and although to some extent that had come into prominence before the Local Government Act of 1888, yet undoubtedly the Local Government Act of 1888 did accentuate very much the difference, because by that Act bodies were formed in each county to which was permitted the power of governing in a great variety of local matters, and different bodies were set up in different counties which might take different views of what was the course to be adopted in the shape of bye-laws for their own particular counties, and in that way enormous change was made. Still, that leaves one matter undoubtedly a Crown matter, and that is the administration of justice. Although it is very clearly a Crown purpose, it is necessarily administered through local channels, requiring therefore local courts in which local magistrates from time to time, as well as the general judges of the land, sit, and, of course, used by them as sessions houses; all of them, and very properly, being exempted from rating as being used for strictly Imperial or Crown purposes, and not in any sense for local purposes. Now that distinction has been too well established by recent cases for us to do anything more than follow it, and I do not propose to give the reasons already given by courts of higher authority than this why that rule should be adopted.

One point has been suggested as raising a difference. It is said that, whereas in previous cases the municipal corporations have been held rateable for buildings occupied by them for municipal purposes, that the same rule does not apply to a county council created by statute and not by charter, and carrying on its functions under the Local Government Act, which is, of course, a general Act. I am unable myself to see the force of that argument. The essential difference between the premises rateable and premises not rateable is that in one case the user is for a local purpose, and in the other case for a Crown or Imperial purpose; and it is none the less a local purpose whether those purposes are carried out by a municipal council or whether they are carried out by a county council administering the affairs of the county generally. If there was any difference between the two—which, however, I do not think there is—I should be inclined to think it more important that the county council should be rateable than that the municipal buildings should be rateable, because the municipal buildings would at any rate be in the corporate boroughs, and consequently the corporation would more or less get the advantage which would be derived from that. In the case of a county council, on the other hand, the county building, the building which is used for administrative purposes must necessarily be in one of a few towns out of several which may be in the county, and the other towns derive comparatively little benefit from any custom or traffic, or anything of that kind which is brought to the towns in which they are by the local situation of the county council building. However, I do not think that would be enough to found a distinction upon; but the real distinction is that which is insisted on in so many cases, the distinction between Crown purposes and local purposes; and I think we can best answer the question which is put to us by saying that so far as it is used for local administrative purposes the Sessions House, as it is at present, is rateable, and that so far as it is used for Crown purposes it is not rateable.

Now it is said there is some difficulty in carrying out this principle. I myself cannot see that there is any difficulty. It is said, for instance (to take an instance), that the clerk to the justices in quarter sessions and the clerk to the Council is one and the same person, and that he occupies premises at the Sessions House which would be required equally for both purposes, if he had not to discharge the other purpose. That may be so, although one finds it a little difficult to understand; but if it is so, why should not the rateability be apportioned? Suppose, for instance, the use made for county purposes occupies half of the year, we will say, and the use made for sessions purposes occupies another half of the year—not, of course, divided into actual periods, but adding the different periods together—they should say that about half the use of it was made for one purpose, and half for the other. Why in such a case is not the total rateability to be divided—half charged upon the County Council, and the other half not charged at all, because it cannot be charged on the Crown? It seems to me there is no difficulty in ascertaining the proper rateability because they are in some other proportion. Of course it is not necessary that they should be in moieties, they may be in some other proportion according to the circumstances of the particular case; and in that way the gentleman who is to be entrusted with the duty of ascertaining what is the proper proportion of the rateability will have no difficulty in arriving at a just and proper conclusion. In case, however, there should arise any difficulty which we do not at present foresee, and which has not as yet been brought to our notice, we propose to retain the case for the present, giving leave to the parties to apply in case any difficulty of this sort should happen to arise, so that they may come here at once without the expense of having to state another case in order to obtain the opinion of the court if any difficulty does arise. Subject to that (and I do not think there is any other question which we can answer at the present moment with satisfaction) I think we may say that the Sessions House is rateable so far as it is used for administrative purposes, and that the extent to which that use goes is a matter of detail to be inquired into by the proper officer.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me that the principles to be applied have been laid down so completely, and are so completely beyond controversy in the present day, that the case really does not present any extreme difficulty. It is quite clear that in so far as these premises are occupied for the purposes which the House of Lords has called "Imperial," there is no rateability. They are put on the footing of premises occupied for the servants of the Crown, and decisions have established that amongst those purposes are two specifically. There may be others, but there are two as to which there is no doubt, that is to say for all purposes connected with the administration of justice and with the business of the police. Either of these purposes has been decided by the House of Lords to be such as brings the occupation, so far as it relates to such matters, within the category of an occupation by the servants of the Crown and for the purposes of the Crown. To that extent it is quite clear that these buildings are not rateable. Again, it has been decided that in so far as premises are used for keeping the records of the county, that that purpose is one which creates an occupation which is not rateable. As to that, therefore, there is no difficulty. Mr. Bosanquet has said that the chief difficulty in this case arises with regard to the use of an office by the clerk of the peace which is used for the common purposes of the administrative business of the Council, and the performance of the duties of the clerk of the peace in connection with the administration of justice. There, it seems to me, that the only possible thing to do, and the only thing to be done in accordance with the established principles of rating, is to make a division. In so far as these offices are occupied by the clerk of the peace for the purpose of carrying on any matter of business that is connected with the administration of justice, the issue of summonses, the precepts for summoning juries, the collection of fines—all purposes, in short, connected with the administration of justice—the occupation is one which is not rateable. There may be other purposes for aught I know (it is impossible to specify them beforehand) which fall within the same rule; but in so far as these offices are used purely for local and municipal purposes and are part of the local administration by the County Council, as the body acting in municipal matters and for the regulation of municipal matters, the buildings are rateable. It does not seem to me that a sensible man with any experience in these matters would have any practical difficulty in making a division. The principle, I think, has been correctly stated in the case, under the heading of "description of property in the rate-book." The only difficulty is the application of that principle. Should any further difficulties arise, those difficulties would be met by the course proposed by my brother Cave, namely, that we should retain this case and give the parties leave to apply if it should be necessary.

I ought to say with regard to the limitation in the local Act it seems to me it could only apply to the plot of land which was originally assigned to the court-house, and that there is nothing in the subsequent Acts, under which a totally distinct area has been appropriated for the purpose of the administration of justice, which revives that section and applies it to the new locality.

Appeal dismissed, with costs.

KILLICK v. GRAHAM.
LINTERN v. BURCHELL. (a.)

Inland Revenue—Excise—Licence to deal in plate—Soliciting orders—Secretary of watch club—Inland Revenue Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 90), ss. 1, 3, 17.

The respondent was a telegraph clerk and the secretary of a watch club formed in a provincial town by a London watchmaker who held an excise licence for dealing in plate. The respondent collected subscriptions from the members of the club, and at intervals conducted a ballot, the winner in which was entitled to select a watch or other article supplied by the watchmaker. The respondent thereupon informed the watchmaker as to the article chosen, and the article was forwarded by the watchmaker to the respondent, who handed it to the member in question. The respondent was paid a commission by the watchmaker. The respondent had no excise licence to deal in plate.

Held, that the respondent was a person soliciting, taking, or receiving orders within the meaning of section 17 of the Inland Revenue Act, 1867, and was not within the exemption as to bonâ fide travellers in that section, and was therefore liable to a penalty.

These two appeals were argued together, the facts being similar.

KILLICK v. GRAHAM.

Special case stated by justices for the borough of Bedford.

The respondent was charged on an information by the appellant, who was an officer of Inland Revenue, with having in July, 1895, dealt in plate without having in force a proper licence, contrary to 30 & 31 Vict. c. 90, s. 3.

The respondent was a clerk in the Post Office at Bedford, and was also secretary to the City of London Watch Club Co., of which Peck, a watchmaker in London, was the proprietor. A telegraph messenger in the Bedford Post Office named Gaunt was a member of the club, and he received a watch from the respondent under the following circumstances. Gaunt joined the club in February, 1895. He paid his first subscription on that day, and received a card from the respondent on which the subscriptions paid by him were marked as they were paid. He paid thirty weekly subscriptions of one shilling to the respondent. The members of the club balloted every month for the right to choose an article, and when Gaunt was successful in the draw he selected a watch, which he received from the respondent. Gaunt was not bound to choose a watch; he might have had, if he pleased, a microscope or a bag. The respondent did not ask Gaunt to choose a watch, and kept nothing in stock; but he communicated Gaunt's wish to Peck, and told Gaunt he would get the watch for him. Gaunt received the watch before he had paid all his subscriptions; he paid the remainder afterwards, and, having paid the last, the respondent wrote on the card: "Settled 31 Aug., /95. F. F. G. for H. S. Peck." The respondent told the appellant that he acted as secretary of the club and as Peck's agent for the supply of watches and other articles. The respondent received a small commission from Peck for any article supplied through him.

On the part of the respondent it was contended that he, being secretary to the club, was not within 30 & 31 Vict. c. 90, s. 17, and the justices dismissed the information upon that ground.

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The question of law for the opinion of the court was whether the respondent, being secretary of a club, was a person requiring a licence as a dealer in plate.

LINTERN v. BURCHELL.

Special case stated by justices for the county of Southampton.

The information was similar to that in Killick v. Graham, and the facts were practically the same, with the exception that the respondent, who was in the employ of a fellmonger, received a commission upon the amount of the subscriptions collected by him from the members, and that the watch was supplied with a warranty from the dealer with whom the respondent was in communication.

The justices dismissed the information.

The Inland Revenue Act, 1867, s. 1, requires an excise licence to be taken out by "every person who shall trade in or sell any article composed wholly or in part of gold or silver in respect of every house, shop, or other place in which his trade or business shall be carried on."

Section 3.—"Every person who shall do any act or carry on any trade or business for which a licence to deal in plate is required by this Act without having in force a proper licence authorizing him so to do shall for every such offence forfeit the sum of £50."

Section 17.—"If any person shall solicit, take, or receive any order for spirits, wine, or other article for the dealing in, retailing, or selling whereof an excise licence is by law required without having in force a proper excise licence authorizing him so to do, he shall forfeit the penalty imposed by law upon a person dealing in, retailing, or selling such article without having an excise licence in force authorizing him so to do. . . . Provided always that nothing herein contained shall be deemed . . . to impose a penalty upon a bonâ fide traveller taking orders for goods which his employer is duly licensed to deal in or sell."

Sir R. B. Finlay, S.G. (Danckwerts with him), for the appellant in each case.—The respondents in both cases are liable to a penalty, for they have either "traded in or sold" articles of silver within section 1, or they come within the words "solicit, take, or receive" an order in section 17. The respondents are not protected by calling themselves agents for Peck: Hotchin v. Hindmarsh, 39 W. R. 607, [1891] 2 Q. B. 181; and they cannot escape liability by the formation of a club: Bowyer v. Percy Supper Club, 42 W. R. 29, [1893] 2 Q. B. 154; Pletts v. Campbell, 43 W. R. 634, [1895] 2 Q. B. 229; Pletts v. Beattie, [1896] 1 Q. B. 519, 40 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 297.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. (Hextall with him), for the respondents.—The respondents do not sell or solicit orders. They induce other persons to join together for the purpose of buying certain articles from someone else. Until the draw has taken place it is not certain that the article will be of plate. Further, the respondents have no place of business. If they in fact solicited orders, they are protected by the exemption in section 17 as to bonâ fide travellers.

He cited Stuchbery v. Spencer, 55 L. J. M. C. 141, 35 W. R. Dig. 118.

Sir R. B. Finlay, S.G., replied.

GRANTHAM, J.—This is a case which has given me very great difficulty, but I have come to the conclusion that, whatever may be the liability of the respondents under sections 1 and 3, they cannot get out of the liability imposed by section 17, which seems to have been intended to be a kind of general net to include all cases of this kind in which people endeavour, I do not say improperly, to increase their trade in exciseable articles without paying any further licence duty. That seems to me to be the object and scope of section 17. The section contains a proviso by which bonâ fide commercial travellers are exempted from the necessity of taking out a licence. I confess I cannot bring these respondents within the term "bonâ fide traveller," which is a well-known trade term applying to a man who goes about the country soliciting orders which he sends up to his employer for execution. I do not think that the respondents are bonâ fide travellers within the meaning of the section, but they do solicit, take, or receive orders for watches. It is true that other articles besides watches may be obtained, but that is probably introduced for the very purpose of preventing the application of the Act. The club was primarily a watch club, and was kept up by a watchmaker. He employed an agent to solicit people to subscribe for watches. Then there was a ballot, and the successful man got his watch at once. The agent got the order, and the watch was sent down to the agent, and was handed by him to the winner in the ballot. I come to the conclusion that the respondents are persons soliciting, taking, or receiving orders for these particular goods. I do not see how it can be said that the respondents are travellers, for one of them is a telegraph clerk and the other a fellmonger.

The appeal must therefore be allowed.

COLLINS, J.—I am of the same opinion; and as we are differing from the justices I will add a few words to the judgment of my learned brother. My mind has vacillated a good deal during the arguments, because it is essential that the Crown, in taking penal proceedings, should make a clear case. I am not satisfied that this case comes within either section 1 or section 3, but when we come to consider section 17 a greater difficulty is presented. I am not sure that what the respondents have done is within the spirit of the enactment, although it may come within the letter. It would, I think, have been possible for the watchmaker in London to do all that he has done here by sending round a person to do week by week what the respondents did on the spot, and that would, I think, amount to the soliciting of orders by a bonâ fide traveller, in which case there would be nothing that the Crown could lay hold of. The question is, Do the facts bring the case within section 17? When we look at what is done in the formation of these clubs we find that it is an elaborate machinery to procure an order from some person to a watchmaker for a watch, the particular person being chosen by ballot. The secretary is paid a commission, and induces people to join the club; out of their subscriptions a fund results, and then the order for a watch is given. The sale to the member of the club is brought about through the agency of the secretary, who therefore, it seems to me, comes within the first part of section 17 as being a person who solicits an order for an exciseable article. I agree that that section primarily applies to the case of a person who, having a licence, solicits orders in a place for which he has no licence; but the words of the section are wide enough to include the case of a man soliciting orders on behalf of another person who himself has a licence, and that is why an exemption is provided in the case of bonâ fide travellers.

I was much impressed by the argument of the respondents' counsel upon this point, and in one sense what they have done is little more than would be done by a bonâ fide traveller. I think, however, the facts are too strong to admit of the respondents being called travellers; in the one case the respondent lives at a place where his work as a fellmonger is carried on and solicits persons working in the same shop as himself to join the club, in the other case the respondent is a post office clerk. I think it would be straining the words too much to hold that the respondents are bonâ fide travellers.

The respondents therefore do not come within the exception in section 17, but fall under the general prohibition in the earlier part of the section. The cases must go back to the justices to convict.

Appeal allowed in both cases.

BROOKE & CO. (LIMITED) v. THE COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE. (a.)

Inland revenue—Stamp duty—Conveyance—Agreement for sale of goodwill and trade-marks—Business carried on abroad and in England—Trade-mark registered in England—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), s. 59.

An agreement under seal was entered into for the sale of a business carried on in the United States, including the goodwill of the said business and the trade-marks and names used in connection therewith, to purchasers in the United Kingdom. The vendors were manufacturers of soap in America, a large proportion of which they sold wholesale to a syndicate in England. The vendors were also owners of a trade-mark registered in and extensively advertised throughout the United Kingdom, whereby a demand for the soap had been created therein.

Held, that the goodwill and trade-mark were "property" within the meaning of section 59 of the Stamp Act, 1891, and not "property locally situate out of the United Kingdom" within the exception contained in that section, and that therefore so much of the consideration as represented the price paid for the said goodwill and trade-mark was chargeable with conveyance duty under section 59 of the Stamp Act, 1891.

Case stated.

This was a case stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue pursuant to section 13 of the Stamp Act, 1891.

On the 4th of July, 1895, an instrument, a copy of which formed part of this case, was presented on behalf of Benjamin Brooke & Co., Limited (the appellants), to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue under the provisions of the 12th section of the Stamp Act, 1891, 54 & 55 Vict. c. 39, for the opinion of the commissioners as to the stamp duty with which the instrument was chargeable.

The instrument was dated the 25th day of July, 1895, and was an agreement under seal made and entered into between Benjamin Brooke & Co., of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, in the United States of America (the vendors), of the one part, and the appellants of the other part.

The facts set out in the case are as follow:—

(3) By clause 1 of the agreement the vendors agreed to sell and the appellants to purchase the freehold works of the vendors (situate in America), the machinery, furniture, and stock-in-trade of the vendors, the book and other debts due to the vendors in connection with their business, the full benefit of all securities for the same, and of all contracts, engagements, rights, and privileges to which the vendors were entitled in relation to the said business, also the goodwill of the said business, all the trade-marks and names used in connection therewith, and all the cash, agencies, assets, and other property of every description to which the vendors were at the date thereof entitled in connection with the said business, excepting certain profits mentioned in clause 9 of the agreement.

(4) It was provided that the consideration for the sale should be the sum of £250,000, payable partly in cash and partly in shares. The purchase money of £250,000 was made up on the following basis:—

Freehold works	18,779	3	1
Machinery and fixtures . .	3,435	4	5
Book debts at 31st December, 1894	31,845	7	0
Stock at same date . . .	95,544	14	7
Cash and sundry assets at same date.	5,361	3	10
Goodwill and trade-marks . .	189,237	19	7
	258,213	12	6
Less liabilities at 31st December, 1894	8,213	12	6

None of the book debts due to the company at the date of the agreement were book debts payable by customers in England.

(5) The vendors were and for many years had been the manufacturers of a well-known soap called "Brooke's Soap." This soap was and is manufactured by them at the premises in Philadelphia mentioned in the agreement. Sales were effected by the vendors to purchasers resident both in the United States and elsewhere, about twenty thirty-oneths in value of such sales being made as hereinafter mentioned to a syndicate of persons in the United Kingdom, about seven thirty-oneths to residents in the United States, and about four thirty-oneths to residents in other European countries and the colonies.

(6) The vendors were and for some years had been the owners of the trade-mark or brand "Brooke's Soap, Monkey Brand," relating to their said soap, which is registered as a trade-mark in England. This trade-mark or brand they circulated very extensively throughout the United Kingdom in newspapers and otherwise as part of pictorial advertisements which drew attention to their said soap, and by means of these advertisements a considerable demand for the soap had been created, and at the time of sale existed in the United Kingdom. The advertisements contained no indication either to the place where the soap was manufactured or to any place where the same could be purchased; and the place of manufacture was never advertised or published in England. These advertisements were inserted by and at the expense of the vendors, a very large sum being spent yearly upon them, and the vendors had an office in London exclusively devoted to the insertion of such advertisements and to other matters connected therewith.

(7) The vendors did not take orders from or deal in any way with either the retail vendors of the soap in England or with the consumers there. Their dealings with purchasers in England were exclusively confined to selling to a syndicated association, consisting of three firms, all resident in the United Kingdom. This syndicate was accustomed to send from England orders to the vendors at their manufactory in Philadelphia for such quantities of soap as they required, and the soap was then despatched therefrom direct to them in England, and was paid for by remittances sent by the syndicate to Philadelphia. The purchasing syndicate then resold it to retail vendors and others in England at such prices as they thought fit.

(8) The vendors' course of business in other European countries was substantially identical with the above.

(9) The commissioners were of opinion that in fact the thing which by the agreement was agreed to be sold under the words "the goodwill of the business and the trade-marks used in connection therewith" was, firstly and principally, the trade-mark and the right of using the same by way of advertisement in the various countries to which they apply; and, secondly, the local business connection with retail vendors and others which had been created in each of those countries by the circulation of these advertisements, and that these were "property" within the meaning of section 59 of the Stamp Act, 1891. They were further of opinion that the United Kingdom trade-mark, the right of using the same and the connection in the United Kingdom created by the advertisement thereof, were not "property locally situate out of the United Kingdom" within the exception contained in that section. They accordingly held that so much of the consideration of £189,237 19s. 7d. hereinbefore mentioned as represented the price paid for the said last-mentioned matters was chargeable with conveyance duty. They arrived at the sum apportionable to the said last-mentioned matters by taking the proportion which the entire profits made by the company for the year 1894, namely, £31,316, bears to the profit made by the English order for that year, namely, £19,989, and assessed ad valorem conveyance duty at the sum of £536 10s. If the commissioners are correct in holding that all the said last-mentioned matters are chargeable with duty under section 59, the accuracy of the apportionment and of the ad valorem duty assessed is not questioned. The instrument has been stamped in conformity with the assessment. A further fixed duty of 10s. was also assessed. No question is to be raised in this case as to the liability to ad valorem conveyance duty of the matters other than the goodwill and trade-marks.

(10) The appellants being dissatisfied with the assessment have, in pursuance of the 13th section of the Stamp Act, 1891, required the commissioners to state and sign a case setting forth the questions on which their opinion was required, and the assessment made by them, and the commissioners do hereby state and sign this case accordingly.

The questions for the opinion of the court were:—

(1) Whether the instrument is chargeable with the duty of £536 10s. in accordance with the assessment of the commissioners?

(2) If not, with what duty the instrument is chargeable?

The appellants contended that the goodwill and trade-mark were not subject to duty under the statute 54 & 55 Vict. c. 39, s. 59, and that they were not within the meaning of that section; and further that the said goodwill and trade-mark were property locally situated out of the United Kingdom.

The commissioners maintained that the instrument was a contract or agreement made in England under seal, and—as regards the subject matters thereof referred to in paragraph 9 of the case—was made for the sale of an interest in property not being property locally situate out of the United Kingdom, or property excepted from or by, section 59 (1) of the Stamp Act, 1891. They further maintained that it was apparent from the facts of the case that by far the most valuable asset which was the subject of the instrument was the "goodwill and trade-marks," and that one hundred and ninety-nine three hundred and thirteenths of the profits of the vendor company were derived from trade in or with the United Kingdom; that the vendor company had a goodwill in the United Kingdom corresponding to such profits, and had trade-marks the interest in which was the creature of the law of the United Kingdom, and had names used in connection with their business which were known and used in the United Kingdom, and the use of which in the United Kingdom was valuable; and that the interest in such goodwill, trade-marks, and names, as regards the United Kingdom, was valuable only under and by virtue of the interest therein given and the protection afforded by the laws of the United Kingdom, and by reason of the exploitation of such goodwill, trade-marks, and names in the United Kingdom.

Murphy, Q.C. (A. T. Lawrence with him), for the appellants.—The American company did not carry on business in England: Grainger v. Gough, ante, p. 561, [1896] A. C. 325, and therefore there could be no goodwill in this country. You cannot have a goodwill except in connection with a business, and that business must be carried on where the goodwill is. The assessment is also on the trade-marks; a trade-mark is not within the meaning of the Act. If there is no goodwill in England, it follows from section 70 of the Trade-Mark Act, 1883, that the trade-mark cannot be transferred here, for it can only be transferred with the goodwill.

Sir R. Webster, A.G., Bosanquet, Q.C., and English Harrison, for the respondents.

POLLOCK, B.—It is apparent from the facts of the case that by far the most valuable part of the assets is the goodwill of the trade-mark. You can have a trade-mark in this country in respect of a thing manufactured abroad. Then if you have a trade-mark that trade-mark is in itself a goodwill. If beyond the trade-mark you have taken the trouble to send agents over here to advertise and see the probable or possible vendees, you do create, not only a trade-mark, but a goodwill, and that goodwill is one which extends principally to regular customers and increases the value of the article. It is therefore quite clear that this appeal must be dismissed.

Trade-mark — Registration — "Words" — Burmese words—Disclaimer—Risk of deception—Undertaking that trade-mark shall be used only on goods exported to particular country—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Acts, 1883 and 1888 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57; 51 & 52 Vict. c. 50).

(a.) Reported by R. C. MACKENZIE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Burmese words expressed in Oriental characters are "words" within the meaning of section 10 (e) of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1888. Regard must therefore be had, in deciding whether a trade-mark containing such words shall be registered, to the meaning of such words; and accordingly, on the principle of the Red Star case, 42 W. R. 420, [1894] 2 Ch. 26, when there are already on the register trade-marks containing a representation of a golden fan, a trade-mark including the Burmese words for "The Golden Fan Brand" will not (at any rate without a disclaimer of the exclusive right to use those words, as to the effect of which, quære) be allowed to be registered. The consent of the owners of the trade-marks resembling that for which registration is sought is not a sufficient ground for allowing such registration, for the court has also to protect the public from being deceived.

In such a case the court has no jurisdiction to allow registration upon an undertaking that the trade-mark shall be used only upon goods exported to a particular country, even if in that country there is no risk of deception.

Appeal from the Vice-Chancellor of the County Palatine of Lancaster.

The applicants, Messrs. John Dewhurst & Sons, were cotton spinners and sewing cotton manufacturers. In June, 1895, they applied at the Manchester branch of the Trade-Marks Registry Office for registration in class 23 of a trade-mark in respect of sewing and other cottons. The trade-mark consisted of three white shells on a golden shield, the words "Oriental Three Cord," and certain Burmese characters, as to which the question in this case arose. In the application for registration it was stated that the meaning of the Burmese characters was "the Golden Fan Brand." There were already upon the register in the same class other somewhat similar trade-marks, one of which consisted of a representation of a golden fan. Consents to the present application had been obtained from the owners of those trade-marks. The comptroller nevertheless refused to allow the applicants' trade-mark to be registered without a disclaimer under section 64, sub-section 2, of the Act of 1883 (as amended by section 10 of the Act of 1888), of the exclusive right to use the Burmese characters. The applicants appealed to the Board of Trade, by whom the appeal was referred to the Palatine Court. There was evidence that the applicants had a considerable trade with Burmah in goods sold under the trade-mark in question, which was known to the natives as the Golden Fan Trade-Mark.

The Vice-Chancellor made an order directing the comptroller to proceed with the registration, and the comptroller appealed.

On the hearing of the appeal the applicants offered to undertake that the goods to which the trade-mark applied should not be exported elsewhere than to Burmah.

Sir Richard Webster, A.G., replied.

LINDLEY, L.J., stated the facts, and continued:—Now that shows the reason why these gentlemen desire to register this label, although they have on the register, and have had for some years, a portion of the label—namely, that part which consists of three shells on a gold shield. They have also on the register the words "Three Shells Brand" under the label. But the affidavit which I have read, I have alluded to for this purpose as showing that these gentlemen had a reason for asking to be allowed to register something more. They want to register the words "The Golden Fan Brand" in Burmese characters. The object of that, of course, is perfectly obvious, because it will give them then a monopoly of the use of these words as part of their trade-mark, and make it an essential part of their trade-mark.

Now, they apply to the comptroller to register that as so many words under clause (e) of section 64 of the Trade-Marks Act of 1883, as amended by section 10 of the Act of 1888: "A word or words having no reference to the character or quality of the goods, and not being a geographical name." It is obvious that "The Golden Fan Brand" comes within that description. They are words in Burmese, and it is sought to register them in Burmese characters. The comptroller then takes this objection. He says: "If you like to register these hieroglyphics under the second part of section 64, and disclaim them as part of your trade-mark, I have no objection; but if you insist upon my registering these as 'words' under clause (e) of section 64, so as to make these words an essential part of your trade-mark, then I do object, because it appears to me that they will necessarily be calculated to deceive." And he grounds that objection upon this. He says: "I have already upon the register several registered trade-marks of fans applicable to class 23 in cotton goods, and, in particular, there is on the register a mark, No. 16,003, of Mr. Boyd, which is a golden fan. Therefore," he says, "I have on the register a golden fan applicable to the same class of goods, and you are asking me to register, not as additional words with a disclaimer, but as an essential part of a new trade-mark, not a golden fan, but the words 'Golden Fan'"; and he says, "Having regard to the principle which was laid down by the Court of Appeal in the Red Star case, I decline to do that. I will do it for you if you like to take it as additional words with a disclaimer; but I will not do it for you if you insist on having it as an essential part of your trade-mark." The Vice-Chancellor of the Duchy considered that objection, and came to the conclusion that the Red Star case differed from the present, and the difference which the learned Vice-Chancellor pointed out, and which unquestionably exists, is this. He says that in the Red Star case there was first of all the objection; and, secondly, there was evidence that the plate which was registered with a star was called by the name of the "Star Brand" or "Star Glass"; and under those circumstances the Vice-Chancellor said there was positive evidence that deception not only was likely, but really did take place. He says there is no such evidence here; and it is true there is no evidence here, except that which I have referred to—namely, the existence on the register of a golden fan with reference to and as applied to cotton goods in class 23.

Now, we must consider that point and see what is to be done. Could Messrs. Dewhurst require the comptroller to register their mark if these hieroglyphics were expressed in language intelligible to Englishmen? In other words, if, instead of the hieroglyphics, you had their equivalent, "The Golden Fan Brand," ought the court to compel the comptroller to put such a mark on the register? Upon that point, I come to the conclusion that unquestionably the court ought not to do anything of the kind. The meaning of them is before the comptroller, as I shall show presently; but the principle of the Red Star case would cover that. Whether it covers this, is another matter; but if the application were to put on the register the words "Golden Fan" or "Golden Fan Brand" as applied to cotton goods, the answer would be that they must be calculated to deceive, because they only express in words what the golden fan of Mr. Boyd expresses to the eye. That is the principle upon which the Red Star case proceeded, and I do not think that any evidence which could be adduced would get over that objection, because we know perfectly well that if you once put upon the register a golden fan in the shape of a picture like Mr. Boyd's, and you also put on the register a mark called "The Golden Fan," although without a golden fan, the two must mislead the public; and Mr. Boyd's consent is no answer to that. Mr. Boyd's consent is important in this respect, that it would show that he was not a competitor, perhaps, and did not care about it; and the fact that he did not oppose the registration would be some evidence that in his opinion it was not calculated to deceive, at all events to any extent which injured him. I am assuming, of course, that there are no pecuniary arrangements between them which would amount to a purchase and sale.

Now, having gone that far, I have gone a very long way; because what the comptroller has to do is this. He says, "You bring me those hieroglyphics; I do not know what they mean; I know nothing at all about them; you must tell me what they mean." Rule 15 says: "Wherever a trade-mark consists of or includes words printed in other than Roman characters, there shall be given at the foot or on the back of each representation a translation of such words signed by the applicant or his agent." I have been looking for it, but I cannot find any similar rule applicable to ordinary European languages in which Roman letters are used. I suppose that the comptroller or the Board of Trade have persons sufficiently conversant with those languages to render translation unnecessary; but, when you get beyond that, this rule is important as showing that the comptroller ought not to register Oriental words, or words in Oriental characters, without knowing what they mean. He is entitled to require a translation; and accordingly we have on the application by Messrs. Dewhurst this indorsement on the form which they have signed and sent in: "The meaning of the Burmese characters appearing on the mark is 'The Golden Fan Brand.'" The comptroller's position is this: "Now you tell me what these hieroglyphics mean, you are asking me to put on the register the words 'The Golden Fan Brand'; the object being that this trade-mark may be called the Golden Fan Brand; that is to say, for the very same object which you would have if you were to put these words on the register in the English language." He says: "The principle of the Red Star case is applicable to this case, and I, in the exercise of my discretion, think I ought not to do it." I do not think the court can say that he was wrong in that. I can see the importance to Messrs. Dewhurst of succeeding, because they would get advantages by having this mark registered which they would not have without it. Let us see what the position of the register will be, and how far the interests of the public will be protected, if that is done. As to the consents, I do not say that they are immaterial, it appears to me that they are valuable as affording some evidence that there may not be deception; but when you come to consider that these trade-marks are on the register for an indefinite time; when you consider that unless they are restricted to particular countries —which is a point I will deal with presently—they are applicable all over the world; and when you consider how they are sold and passed from one hand to another, these consents do not protect the public at all, and I do not see how any evidence can get over the difficulty that there will be upon the register two trade-marks—one a picture of a golden fan, and the other the words "The Golden Fan." That ought not in my judgment to be allowed, by reason of the obvious deception which must grow up if these words are used, as they would necessarily be in the course of trade, should the trade be pushed in other countries than Burmah. Therefore, I think on that principle, which is an extremely far-reaching one, that the comptroller is right. I think that it does not matter what the language is, nor what the hieroglyphics are, if the meaning of the hieroglyphics and the meaning of the foreign language is a mere verbal description of a mark already on the register. If you have a mark on the register applicable to cotton goods, consisting of a golden fan, you cannot have another mark called a "Golden Fan" in any language or in any hieroglyphics. That appears to me to be the real broad ground upon which we ought to decide this case.

It was urged on behalf of Messrs. Dewhurst that, whether these words are registered as additional words and disclaimed, or whether they are registered as words and as an essential part of the trade-mark, there will be the same probability or possibility of deception. It is said that there is no deception in either case. I think the Attorney-General's answer to that is sufficient. It is a very different thing to register words as part of your trade-mark and to disclaim the right to any exclusive use of them, and to register those same things as an essential part of your trade-mark which gives you an exclusive right to use them. Whether the comptroller was not a little too indulgent in saying, "I will accept this mark if you will treat these words as an addition to your mark with a disclaimer," it is not necessary to consider; but I do see that there is an immense practical difference between the two things; and it appears to me, I confess, for the reason I have given, that it is not illogical or unreasonable for the comptroller to take the view: "You may have these if you like, but you must have them with a disclaimer, if you have them at all, under the second clause of section 64; but you must not have them under the clause as an essential part of your trade-mark, and I will not register them unless I am compelled."

The other point which has been suggested is this. It is said that under section 62, sub-sections 4 and 5, the court can order this mark to be registered, subject to any conditions which the court may think proper. Now we are asked to do this. The applicants say: "If you will not allow us to register this without any conditions or without any limitations, we shall be quite content if you will allow us to register it upon this condition, that we shall only put the mark on goods exported to Burmah." Under the Act, apart from the general words of the sub-sections to which I have referred, there is nothing that gives the court power to do this. There is nothing in the schedules and nothing in the rules which have been made under the authority of the Act which authorizes the court to impose such a condition as that which is suggested. In other words, there is no provision made by the Legislature for granting a trade-mark which shall be used only in one particular country. When you see the difficulty of enforcing any such condition in practice, you see the good sense of there being no provision for registering a trade-mark which shall be confined to any particular country.

Then it is said, "Well, but similar things have been done"; and reference was made by Mr. Hopkinson and Mr. Cutler to In re Keep's Trade-Mark and In re Mitchell's Trade-Mark, and other cases, in which the court certainly did order the comptroller to enter upon the register a note of an agreement between the two litigants, as I may call them, respecting the use which should be made of a particular registered mark. I will observe that those cases were decided when there was a rule which does not exist now. They were decided upon the interpretation of a rule which has been abolished, and which contained some language which possibly might justify that. I doubt very much whether those cases have not gone too far; but, at all events, they have gone far short of what we are asked to do here. The utmost the court has ever done is to say: "We will direct the comptroller to put on the register a note of an agreement which binds the registered owner of a trade-mark to some rival as to the mode in which he shall use that trade-mark." We have no such agreement here, and we are not asked to direct the comptroller to put on the register any memorandum of any such agreement; but we are asked to go further, and do it ourselves, and say: "You shall be put upon the register upon condition that you only use these marks upon goods which are exported to Burmah." I think we ought not to do it, and I think we ought not to do it for this reason. I doubt very much whether the Legislature ever contemplated such a mode of working the Trade-Marks Acts as that. As I pointed out during the argument, without the very greatest possible care we should be raising questions of international law of a very serious character and very great difficulty, and we should be imposing terms which we could not possibly enforce —which of itself is quite a sufficient reason for not imposing them. Upon these grounds, therefore, I think that on this point the comptroller is right.

I purposely abstain from saying anything about what I understand is the great point, namely, whether or not the comptroller is right in saying that he ought not to be compelled to register any Oriental words, for it is not necessary to decide it on the present occasion. If the comptroller thinks it is right to allow the words to go on as additional marks, subject to a disclaimer, I do not express any opinion precluding him from doing so. I think that the comptroller was perfectly justified in declining to register this mark, and therefore this appeal must be allowed.

LOPES, L.J.—It occurs to me that this short answer may be given to the case. If the words sought to be registered had been in English, and had been the words "The Golden Fan Brand," I take it it is perfectly clear that the comptroller would not and ought not to have permitted the registration of those words as an essential part of the trade-mark, because, having regard to the Red Star case, it appears to me that it has been distinctly held that if words are sought to be registered which convey the same meaning as any symbol or picture which had been previously registered would convey, then those words cannot be registered as an essential part of the trade-mark, because they would be calculated to mislead or deceive. But it is said here that these words, being in Burmese, would not be calculated to mislead or to deceive. Now, if we were to hold that the mere fact that the words in question were in the Burmese language was sufficient to rebut the probability of deception, I ask, Where are we to stop? We should have to go the length of holding that the fact of words being in any foreign language would be sufficient to rebut the probability of deception. In my opinion that cannot be done. I think, therefore, that the comptroller was right in only permitting the registration of these words subject to the disclaimer of any intention to use them as an essential part of the trade-mark.

I now desire to refer to a matter which I consider very important. We have been told that the rival tradesmen, those who have trade-marks resembling, as pictures, the words sought to be registered, consented to this registration. Those consents are some evidence of there not being a probability of persons being deceived; but to say that they are to have any greater effect would be most mischievous. The public have no notice of these consents; but the object of the Act is to protect the public as well as traders. It is obvious that these consents might be bought and sold, and anything more mischievous than that it would be impossible to imagine.

It was suggested that we might limit the use of these words to goods exported to Burmah, so that the trade-mark might be used there. To my mind such a limitation would be absolutely useless, for I cannot see how it could be enforced. But, again, I think that it would be against the policy of the Act. It seems to me essential that the register should be kept clear and in proper order, and if limitations of this kind could be inserted on the register—I do not think they can—I think it would prevent the register being so kept. I think, therefore, that the decision of the comptroller was right, and that this appeal ought to be allowed.

KAY, L.J., stated the facts, and continued:—As was pointed out by Lindley, L.J., it is essential for an applicant, if he is proposing to use as part of his trade-mark any other characters than Roman characters, to send to the comptroller a translation of the characters which it is desired to put on, in order that the comptroller may know the meaning of the characters which are proposed to be registered. The meaning of these words, as explained on the face of the application, is "The Golden Fan," on the back of the application the translation is "Golden Fan Brand." Now, I cannot help remarking that there is no golden fan upon this mark at all. There are three shells which are not in gold, put upon a golden shield. But the evidence given by Mr. Dewhurst is this: "We send out cotton goods, among other places, to Burmah, and in the Burmese markets the Burmese seem to have taken the shells for fans, and they have called the goods which we sell 'Golden Fan' or 'Golden Fan Brand' goods." It is rather curious, because the shells are not in gold, and they are not fans, but the evidence is not contradicted, and there is no attempt to deny it, and for the purposes of this application we must take it to be true. So that the comptroller, being compelled by the rule to consider the meaning of these Oriental characters, and being told that the meaning is "Golden Fan Brand," finds that he has got upon the register a golden fan, amongst other things; and observe, although Messrs. Dewhurst want to register this mark for only a part of the goods comprised in class 23, the golden fan is upon the register for all the goods in class 23, including, of course, these cotton goods, "sewing, crochet, and embroidery cottons of various kinds," for which Messrs. Dewhurst want to register this mark.

I find in section 73 these words: "It shall not be lawful to register as part of or in combination with a trade-mark any words the exclusive use of which would, by reason of their being calculated to deceive or otherwise, be deemed disentitled to protection in a court of justice." The comptroller has, therefore, to consider not only whether the mere appearance of the words is calculated to deceive, but whether the use of those words would be calculated to deceive. Suppose the owner of the golden fan trade-mark, which, as I have said, extends to the whole of the goods in class 23, of which these cotton goods are part, chose to carry on in Burmah a trade in cotton goods of this very kind, the use of the words "Golden Fan Brand" in Burmah would be calculated to deceive people who wanted to buy golden fan goods. But that objection is said to be untenable because the owners of these marks on the register have signified their consent to these Burmese words being put on the register. I do not think that is conclusive; it is only some evidence that they are not calculated to deceive. But if the comptroller thinks that there is sufficient similarity between these marks to make the use of one calculated to deceive, he is not concluded by a consent given in that way, quite apart from the mode in which that consent may have been obtained. I therefore think that in the exercise of the discretion of the comptroller, when he is asked to put this mark upon the register and is told that the parties are not satisfied to treat these words as added words, and to disclaim the exclusive use of them, but intend to have them as an essential part of this trade-mark which he is asked to register, he has a right to say, and is justified in saying: "I think if I were to put them on the register the use of the words would be calculated to deceive, and therefore I do not think it right to put upon the register, which has already upon it a golden fan for this class of goods, words which import—and I am bound to know the meaning of them—Golden Fan Brand. Therefore I will not consider in what language the words happen to be or whether the words would be intelligible to any ordinary European, because it is a part of this legislation, embodied in rule 15, that the comptroller shall know what is the meaning of the Oriental words, and shall consider that meaning with reference to section 73." I, for that reason, think that there was quite sufficient ground in this case for the comptroller saying that he refused to register these words, unless they were treated as added words, with the condition which in that case the statute imposes. Whether he is right in saying, "I will register them if that condition is complied with," I do not at present say. It was not complied with, it was refused; and accordingly the only mode in which he could have registered them was as an essential part of the trade-mark.

But then it is said: "We are quite content to submit to a condition that these words shall not be used in any country except Burmah." In the first place I cannot find that this Act of Parliament enables the court to put upon the register a trade-mark with a limitation of that kind. I should expect, if that were the meaning of the Legislature, to find a very distinct provision to that effect. The only section which in any way can be treated as having that meaning, or giving to the comptroller, or the Board of Trade, or this court, any power of limiting registration in that way is section 62, which refers to the imposition of conditions, but I do not think myself that it has that meaning. I do not think imposing conditions in that section means a limitation of the geographical area within which the trade-mark can be used. There is nothing in the rules which empowers the Board of Trade, or this court, or the comptroller, to make a limitation of that kind in putting a trade-mark on the register.

For these reasons I think that the discretion exercised by the comptroller was properly exercised, and that the mark ought not to be put upon the register.

TOTTENHAM URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL v. WILLIAMSON. (a.)

Local government—Nuisance—Abatement—Action by local authority—Consent of Attorney-General—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 107.

Proceedings by a local authority under section 107 of the Public Health Act, 1875, to enforce the abatement of a nuisance from which the local authority suffers no damage, can only be taken with the consent of the Attorney-General.

Wallasey Local Board v. Gracey, 35 W. R. 694, 36 Ch. D. 593, approved.

Appeal from an order of Day, J., discharging an interim injunction for the abatement of a nuisance.

The action was brought by the Tottenham Urban District Council against the defendants to compel them to abate an alleged nuisance consisting of premises kept in such a state as to be injurious to health within the meaning of section 91 of the Public Health Act, 1875.

The question was whether the plaintiffs were entitled to bring the action without the consent of the Attorney-General.

Day, J., held, on the authority of Wallasey Local Board v. Gracey, 35 W. R. 694, 36 Ch. D. 593, that in the absence of special damage the local authority could not sue in respect of a public nuisance except with the sanction of the Attorney-General by action in the nature of an information.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Montague Lush, for the plaintiffs.—Section 107 of the Public Health Act authorizes a local authority by action to put a stop to nuisances prohibited by section 91. It provides that "any local authority may, if in their opinion summary proceedings would afford an inadequate remedy, cause any proceedings to be taken against any person in any superior court of law or equity to enforce the abatement or prohibition of any nuisance under this Act, or for the recovery of any penalties." The section treats proceedings to abate nuisances and proceedings to recover penalties on the same footing. In neither case is the sanction of the Attorney-General necessary. Where such sanction is required the Act expressly so provides (see sections 69 and 253). The decision of Stirling, J., in Wallasey Local Board v. Gracey is not binding on this court, and ought to be overruled.

Cock, Q.C., and Pocock, for the defendants.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—I am of opinion that the judgment of Stirling, J., in Wallasey Local Board v. Gracey was perfectly right, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The ordinary law is that where a person complains of a public nuisance he applies to the Attorney-General, and the Attorney-General becomes plaintiff at the relation of that person and proceeds by information. No other course is open to the person who complains, unless he has suffered special damage. I do not think that the Public Health Act gives any new remedy in this respect. I agree with Stirling, J., that section 107 only refers to proceedings known to the law. The present proceedings are not known to the law, because the fiat of the Attorney-General was necessary before they could properly be taken. In my opinion the action is misconceived.

A. L. SMITH, L.J., concurred.

WILLESDEN LOCAL BOARD v. WRIGHT. (a.)

Local government—Paving expenses—Apportionment—Award of arbitrator—Remedy of local authority—Proceedings to enforce award—Jurisdiction of High Court—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 150—Arbitration Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), s. 12.

An award of an arbitrator under section 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875, fixing the proportion of paving expenses payable by an owner of premises to the local authority is not enforceable under section 12 of the Arbitration Act, 1889.

Appeal from an order of Pollock, B., refusing to enforce an award.

The Willesden Local Board served notices, under section 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875, on the respondent and the other owners of premises fronting a street within their district, requiring them to execute certain paving works.

The owners having failed to comply with the notices, the Local Board executed the works, and an apportionment of the expenses was made by their surveyor.

The respondent having disputed the apportionment which was made against him, the matter was referred to arbitration in accordance with the terms of the section, and an award was made that the contribution payable by him was £175.

After the expiration of the six months within which the amount might have been recovered in a summary manner by proceedings before justices, the Local Board took out a summons at chambers to have the award enforced pursuant to section 12 of the Arbitration Act, 1889.

The master held that he had no jurisdiction to enforce the award, and Pollock, B., affirmed his decision.

The Local Board appealed.

R. E. Moore (H. C. Munroe with him), for the appellants.—The master and the judge thought that the only method by which the Local Board could recover this sum was—as provided by section 150 of the Public Health Act—in a summary manner, which is explained by section 251 to mean before a court of summary jurisdiction. But the Act itself provides other remedies. Section 180, sub-section 14, allows a local authority to enforce an award by proceedings in the High Court. By section 257 a local authority may bring an action to recover paving expenses. Section 261 allows such expenses, if they are under £50, to be recovered in the county court. The proper remedy for the Local Board in this case is to enforce the award in the High Court.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

He cited Sandgate Local Board v. Keene, [1892] 1 Q. B. 831, 40 W. R. Dig. 131, and Brierley Hill Local Board v. Pearsall, 33 W. R. 56, 9 App. Cas. 595.

John Mews, for the respondent.—The only remedy for the Local Board is to go to a court of summary jurisdiction. The respondent wishes to dispute his liability to pay anything in respect of these paving expenses. He cannot do this in proceedings on the award, which only fixes the amount of contribution, and does not touch the question of liability.

He cited West v. Downman, 29 W. R. 6, 14 Ch. D. 111; Walker v. Beckenham Local Board, 50 L. T. N. S. 207, 32 W. R. Dig. 8; Tottenham Local Board v. Rowell, 25 W. R. 135, 1 Ex. D. 514, and 29 W. R. 36, 15 Ch. D. 378; and Eccles v. Guardians of Wirrall Union, 34 W. R. 412, 17 Q. B. D. 107.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The question is whether the master and the judge were right in refusing to enforce this award. If it could be enforced under the Arbitration Act, they had no reason for refusing to enforce it. But in my opinion they were right, because this award is not such an award as can be enforced under the Arbitration Act at all. In West v. Downman this court had to construe the Public Health Act, 1848, and we held that, inasmuch as before that Act a local board could not have recovered paving expenses from owners of property, and as the Act imposed on owners for the first time the liability to pay such expenses, the only remedy was the remedy given by the Act itself. Now what does the Public Health Act, 1875, say about a remedy? A remedy is given by section 150—viz., by summary proceedings before justices. We must look at the whole Act, and see if there is any other remedy given. It is argued that another remedy is given by section 261. That section provides that if the amount of a demand which a local authority is empowered to recover in a summary manner is under £50, proceedings may be taken before a county court judge, who will then determine the same question which would be determined by justices if the amount were over £50. That, however, does not alter the liability, it merely alters the tribunal which determines the liability. At any rate, section 261 clearly does not give any right to take proceedings in the High Court. Then does section 257 authorize a local authority to bring an action in the High Court? That section deals with expenses for the repayment of which an owner "is made liable under this Act"—I think that means made liable under section 150 by order of a court of summary jurisdiction—and it provides that the local authority may make such expenses a charge on the premises in respect of which they have been incurred, and may bring an action to enforce that charge. But it does not give any new right against the person who is owner at the time when the work is done. Then there is section 180, sub-section 14, which provides that "any submission to arbitration under the provisions of this Act may be made a rule of any of the superior courts, on the application of any party thereto." It is said that this by implication gives power to the local authority to take proceedings in the High Court to enforce an award. But, in my opinion, that is not a necessary implication. I think that the words of the sub-section are satisfied by saying that they prevent either party from revoking a submission to arbitration. We are therefore left to section 150. That section contains the arbitration clause; but all that an arbitrator can do is to fix the amount, he cannot impose a liability. The result is that the only remedy which was open to the local authority here was to go before justices. They did not take that course within six months, and now it is too late for them to do so. I therefore think that the learned judge was right in refusing to make an order to enforce this award, and the appeal must be dismissed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. This award fixed the amount of the respondent's contribution, and the question of amount cannot now be disputed. The appellants seek to enforce the award, and they ask us to make an order which will have the effect of shutting out the respondent from raising any defence which he may wish to raise on the question of his being liable at all. I think that this is not such an award as comes within section 12 of the Arbitration Act, as it is not an adjudication as to liability. The question whether an action can be brought to recover these expenses does not arise, but in my opinion this is not an award which can be summarily enforced.

Appeal dismissed.

Divorce — Maintenance — Alienability — Matrimonial Causes Act, 1866 (29 & 30 Vict. c. 32), s. 1.

Maintenance granted to a divorced wife under section 1 of 29 & 30 Vict. c. 32 cannot be prospectively released or assigned.

Appeal from the President.

An order had been made, on the wife's petition, for the dissolution of the marriage of the parties, and subsequently an order was made under section 32 of the Act 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85 that the husband should pay to the wife a sum of £80 a year by way of permanent maintenance.

In 1886 the wife executed a deed by which she purported to release the husband from all obligation to pay her allowance; but in 1892 Romer, J., set aside the deed. Later in the same year the wife by deed bound herself not to enforce the order, provided the husband made certain other payments to her.

In January, 1895, the wife obtained from the President an order for payment of £600, arrears of her allowance. This order was not enforced, and she afterwards agreed to withdraw it.

In July, 1895, she obtained a writ of sequestration to enforce payment. The husband then applied to the President to set aside the order for payment of £600, which had been obtained ex parte, and to set aside the writ of sequestration. The President refused the motion, but held that the wife was entitled to recover arrears of her allowance only as from October, 1893. Both parties appealed; but in the wife's appeal there was nothing requiring a report.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 6.—The following written judgments were delivered :—

LINDLEY, L.J.—The Divorce Act of 1857 established divorces as distinguished from judicial separations, and contained provisions defining the position and rights of divorced wives. A woman divorced is no longer a wife; she has not the rights, nor has she the duties, of a married woman. She is at liberty to marry again. The equitable doctrines of separate use and restraint against anticipation have no application to her until she does marry again. Whatever property she may have or acquire is her own; her former husband has no interest in it. He, on the other hand, is not bound to support her; she has no implied authority to pledge his credit even for necessaries. She is free from him, and he from her. Section 26 of the Act of 1857, which makes a husband liable for the support of his wife if he does not pay her the alimony ordered by the court, only applies to judicial separation. There is no similar enactment applicable to cases of divorce. The court for divorce has, however, power to make orders for the maintenance of a divorced wife (section 32), and for the custody of the children of the marriage (section 35), and for the execution of settlements for the benefit of the innocent party and of such children (section 45). These powers have been enlarged by later Acts, and rules have been made for their exercise. On the present occasion we are only concerned with the power to order maintenance after divorce. This is conferred by section 32 of the Act of 1857 and by section 1 of the amending Act of 1866. The rules relating to it are those of the 26th of December, 1865, 95 to 103. It is not immaterial to observe that alimony for wives after judicial separation—i.e., permanent alimony—is governed by other sections and rules, viz., sections 22, 24, 26, and rules 81 to 94. Permanent alimony for a judicially separated wife is and always has been inalienable by her. The court which ordered it never lost control over it, and she could not by assignment or otherwise deprive herself of her right to it so long as she and her husband lived separate and apart from each other. This doctrine is based on the old ecclesiastical law, and was recognized and acted upon in In re Robinson, 33 W. R. 17, 27 Ch. D. 160. In Linton v. Linton, 33 W. R. 714, 15 Q. B. D. 239, and again in In re Hawkins, 42 W. R. 202, [1894] 1 Q. B. 25, it was held that the bankruptcy of the husband did not discharge him from his obligation to pay his wife alimony under an order of the court. The question now arises whether the same doctrine applies to an order for permanent maintenance after a divorce as to alimony after judicial separation. The learned President has held that it does. He came to this conclusion on various grounds, and he appears to have thought that the point was really decided by Linton v. Linton. The judgment of the Master of the Rolls in that case certainly shows that he did not consider permanent maintenance under section 1 of the Act of 1866 as more alienable than alimony. But Linton v. Linton was a case of judicial separation and not divorce, and the differences between the two are so great that a decision on the one cannot be regarded as if it were a decision on the other. The headnote in Jardine v. Jardine, 30 W. R. 91, 6 P. D. 213, is so worded as to suggest that the full court had decided that the court could modify orders for permanent maintenance; but all that the court said was that the allowance of £500 a year was not too much, as it could be reduced. The question which has now to be decided, and decided for the first time, turns simply on the interpretation and effect of section 1 of the Act of 1866. The object of the section is plain: it is to enable the court to order divorced husbands who cannot make settlements to maintain their divorced wives out of their earnings. The payments are to be made to the divorced wife for the joint lives of herself and her former husband weekly or monthly, and are to be for her maintenance and support. This language points to a purely personal allowance. Such allowances are by no means unknown to the law. Alimony is one instance, an officer's full or half pay is another. It is true that in a case like this the court has no power to increase the allowance once made, and there is good reason for this, for, the marriage bond being at an end, there is no reason why the woman's allowance should increase with her late husband's means. On the other hand, if he cannot pay the allowance fixed by the court, the court can reduce it or suspend its payment, or even discharge the order for maintenance, and so release the husband altogether. This power goes far to show that permanent maintenance under section 1 of the Act of 1866 is more like alimony than an ordinary annuity, or than an annuity ordered to be secured under section 32 of the Act of 1857. I cannot think that if a divorced wife became bankrupt the Legislature intended that her former husband should be compelled to pay her allowance to her trustee or to a purchaser of it from him.

It is, however, necessary to notice two difficulties which here present themselves. In the first place, a deed or will granting an allowance to a person for his or her maintenance and support, without more, is alienable: see Younghusband v. Gisborne, 1 Coll. 400. But this is because an absolute gift cannot be fettered by imposing a particular mode of enjoyment. It does not follow that an Act of Parliament must be construed so as not to infringe this rule. In the next place an annuity ordered to be secured under section 32 of the Act of 1857 has been decided to be property alienable and chargeable by the divorced wife: see Harrison v. Harrison, 36 W. R. 748, 13 P. D. 180. Is an allowance to be paid to a divorced wife under section 1 of the Act of 1866 more personal and inalienable than such an annuity? It is certainly less secure and less permanent. Under section 32 of the Act of 1857 an annuity may be ordered to be secured to the wife for her own life, but this cannot be done under section 1 of the Act of 1866. In Harrison v. Harrison there was no deed securing the annuity to be construed. There was only an order to secure an annuity. As pointed out by Cotton, L.J., on p. 183 (13 P. D.), a deed might have been drawn making the annuity determinable on alienation whether voluntary or involuntary, and the only point decided was that the wife's solicitor, who had procured her the order for its payment, would have been held entitled to a charge on the annuity for his costs under 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127, s. 28, if it had not been for other circumstances which induced the court not to give him such a charge. I do not think that this case compels me to put upon section 1 of the Act of 1866 an interpretation which I should not otherwise think correct. Fry, L.J., on p. 187, drew attention to the fact that an annuity ordered to be settled under section 32 of the Act of 1857 was very different from an allowance ordered to be paid under section 1 of the Act of 1866. I concur in this view of the two sections. Although, therefore, I cannot regard Linton v. Linton or any other previous cases as actually deciding the question before us either one way or the other, yet, having regard to the language and object of the section and the analogies to which I have alluded, I have arrived at the conclusion that the interpretation put upon it by the learned President is correct, and that allowances to divorced wives made under it are personal to themselves and cannot be assigned. Nor can they, in my opinion, be released without the sanction of the court. A divorced wife need not enforce an order for her own maintenance unless she pleases, and she may release and perhaps assign her right to arrears. But it does not follow that she can bind herself not to enforce payment in future, nor that she can assign her right to future payments. I do not say that an order under section 1 of the Act of 1866 for permanent maintenance cannot be discharged by the court with the consent of the divorced husband and wife, even if the man is able to pay it; but until such an order is discharged the divorced wife cannot, in my opinion, prospectively deprive herself or be deprived of the benefit of the maintenance which the court has ordered to be paid to her.

LOPES, L.J.—This case raises an important question. It is whether sums of money for the maintenance of a divorced wife ordered by the court under the power conferred on the court by section 1 of 29 & 30 Vict. c. 32, are alienable. This Act was passed in 1866, and was intended to enlarge the power of the court in cases where the husband had no property on which the payment of a gross or annual sum could be secured. Section 32 of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85 had said that the court may, in pronouncing any decree for a dissolution of marriage, order that the husband shall, to the satisfaction of the court, secure to the wife such gross or annual sum of money as to the court may seem reasonable, and for that purpose may refer it to one of the conveyancing counsel of the Court of Chancery to settle and approve of a proper deed to be executed by all necessary parties. The court under this section could only act where there was property upon which the sums of money ordered could be secured. I do not doubt that the court could have directed that the deed to be prepared should contain a provision against alienation or anticipation by the wife, but in the absence of such a provision the wife would no doubt be at liberty to alienate. There is a substantial difference between permanent alimony, which is ordered after a judicial separation, and maintenance which is ordered after a divorce. There is, too, a substantial difference between the position of a wife who is judicially separated from her husband and a wife who is divorced. In the former case the relations of husband and wife continue, and cohabitation may at any time be resumed. In the latter case the woman is no longer the wife. She cannot again become the wife unless, after the decree is made absolute, she remarries her former husband. She may marry again. He is not bound to support her. She cannot pledge her husband's credit, even for necessaries. In point of fact, she becomes in every respect in the eye of the law a feme sole, with all the liabilities and all the privileges of a feme sole. It is plain that permanent alimony and maintenance must stand on a different footing. Permanent alimony has been held to be inalienable: In re Robinson. Some of the grounds assigned for its being inalienable do not apply to maintenance. The court has not the same control over maintenance. The court can alter or take away alimony whenever it pleases, it is completely under the control of the court. The Act with which we are concerned in this case is 29 & 30 Vict. c. 32. [His lordship read the section, and continued:—] Is the maintenance, which is to be for the support of the wife, alienable? After much consideration I come to the conclusion it is not. The object of the Legislature was to compel the husband to make such a provision for the wife out of his monthly or weekly earnings for her support as would keep her respectable, and be in substitution for that support to which she would have been entitled had she continued his wife, and which would not have been capable of being alienated or anticipated by her. It is to be during their joint lives, and to be paid at short intervals, and the court keeps its hand upon the maintenance, because if the husband is unable to make the payments the court can discharge or modify the order, or temporarily suspend the same as to the whole or any part of the money ordered to be paid, and again revive the same order wholly or in part. Why should the court reserve to itself a power to revive a modified or suspended order if the wife might have alienated her interest? The court would not be concerned to restore an order made in favour of a wife to assist an assignee who could have no claim on the husband; nor do I think the court would be justified in enforcing an order for maintenance against the husband on the application of the assignee. In my judgment this maintenance is in the nature of a personal annuity, and, though in many respects unlike permanent alimony, is, very much for the same reasons as apply to permanent alimony, inalienable. The allowances in both cases are given to the wife, like half-pay given to officers in the Army and Navy, in order that she may maintain herself, and in their very nature are, in my judgment, inconsistent with alienation. I think the learned President was right, and that this maintenance cannot either be alienated or released.

KAY, L.J.—The question in this case is whether a provision for the maintenance of a divorced wife, by periodical payments, which the Divorce Court has ordered the former husband to pay, under the power conferred upon it by the Act of 1866, can be released to the former husband by the divorced wife. By an Act of 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), s. 32, the court, in pronouncing a decree for dissolution of marriage, may order that the husband should secure, to the satisfaction of the court, a gross or annual sum of money, and refer it to conveyancing counsel to settle a deed securing it upon the property of the divorced husband. It was decided in Harrison v. Harrison that where the court had made an order under that statute for securing an annual sum to the divorced wife, but no deed had been executed, the provision by way of annuity was alienable. Cotton, L.J., intimated in that case that a deed might be so framed as to make the annuity cease on alienation. As the grantee of such a provision is no longer a married woman, the only mode of doing this, according to the ordinary law of property, would be to limit the annuity so that it would altogether cease or should go over to another person upon any attempt to alienate. Except in the case of a woman actually under coverture, the power of alienation, which is an incident of property, cannot otherwise be taken away from a person who is not under disability. The sole exceptions to this rule are the case of a married woman who has separate property, as to which she is a feme sole, who may nevertheless be restrained from anticipating that property, and certain allowances like the half-pay officers in the Army, which for public reasons are treated as inalienable. Now, that being the state of the law, the Act of 1866 was passed. It had been found that in many cases where divorce was decreed the divorced husband had no property on which a provision for the divorced wife could be secured. Accordingly the statute 29 & 30 Vict. c. 32, s. 1, was passed, which has been read. The power of making this kind of provision for the maintenance of a divorced wife is altogether a creature of statute. Neither Act says anything about its being inalienable. If the provision were a gross sum, or, it would seem, any sum by way of annuity, under the Act of 1857 it might be assigned, according to Harrison v. Harrison, unless the deed securing it were so framed as to make it cease on the attempt to alienate it. Alimony, though permanent, has been held to be inalienable: In re Robinson. But alimony is a provision for a wife, not for a woman who is no longer a wife. Moreover, the court which granted it has power to alter it or even to take it away. Under the Act of 1866 there is a similar power as to maintenance. The court has power to diminish the amount, or to discharge the order or suspend it in case the divorced husband should become unable to continue to pay it, but only in that event. The statutes do not in terms give any other power to interfere with it when once granted. But the provision is intended for the personal "maintenance and support" of the divorced woman. In cases which come under the Act of 1866, and where the husband has no property on which it can be secured, it must often be the only thing the woman has to depend upon for her livelihood. Although I feel strongly the difficulty arising from the silence of the statutes upon the point, and also from the decision of this court in Harrison v. Harrison, I am not disposed to differ from the judgment of the President in the present case, and I think that the appeal should be dismissed.

In re LEE'S SETTLEMENT TRUSTS. (a.)

Trustee—New trustee—Decrease in number of trustees—Vesting order—Jurisdiction—Trustee Act, 1893, ss. 26, 35.

Where one of four trustees of a settlement has been adjudicated a bankrupt and absconded, the court has jurisdiction to make an order vesting the estate in the other three trustees, although the number of trustees be thereby diminished.

Petition.

By an ante-nuptial settlement of 4th September, 1882, the intended husband covenanted with the four trustees therein named to pay to them within six months after the marriage a sum of £10,000 with interest from the marriage, and if this sum should not be then paid, that he would pay interest thereon at 4 per cent. He charged all his interest in certain real estate with the payment of this £10,000 and interest.

By another settlement of even date the trusts of this £10,000 and of £5,000 South Australian bonds were declared.

In 1891 one of the four trustees was adjudicated a bankrupt and absconded, and his whereabouts was unknown. The £10,000 was still outstanding, and the £5,000 South Australian bonds were deposited in the joint names of the four trustees at Coutts' Bank.

The husband and wife and the three continuing trustees now applied by petition under the Trustee Act, 1893, ss. 26, 35, that the right to sue for and recover the said sum of £10,000 and the interest from time to time to become due for the same, and the benefit of all securities for the same, including the charge created by the first mentioned settlement on the share of the husband in the real estate therein mentioned, might vest in the three trustees, to be held by them upon the trusts of the second settlement; and that the right to sue for and recover the £5,000 South Australian bonds, and any interest from time to time due in respect thereof, and all other choses in action (if any), subject to the trusts of the second settlement, might vest in the three trustees, to be held by them on the trusts of that settlement.

As there were three continuing trustees, it was submitted by the petitioners that it was not necessary to appoint a new trustee in the place of the absconding trustee.

Bryan Farrer, for the petitioners.—In In re Gardiner's Trusts, 35 W. R. 28, 33 Ch. D. 590, the court refused to make a vesting order without first appointing a new trustee in the place of the absconding trustee. The reasons for the practice thus settled have now been altered by the Trustee Act, ss. 26, 35, which have widened the jurisdiction of the court. A similar order has been made by the Court of Appeal in In re Leon, [1892] 1 Ch. 348, 40 W. R. Dig. 269, under sections 135 and 136 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, where the words are similar to those of sections 26 and 35 of the Trustee Act, 1893. A similar order has been made in Dugmore v. Suffield, W. N. 1896, p. 50.

CHITTY, J.—Sections 26 and 35 of the Trustee Act, 1893, are very wide in their terms. In my opinion I have jurisdiction to make the order prayed for.

NORTON v. DASHWOOD. (a.)

Executor—Devisee—Fixtures—Tapestry.

Tapestry on the walls of a room in a family mansion, which was called the "tapestry room," had about a century ago been affixed to the walls of the room in a manner that skilled witnesses said would now be used if it was required to fix tapestry permanently. The mansion-house had been settled by the will of a former owner in strict settlement, but the will made no mention of the tapestry. The tapestry was claimed as a chattel by the residuary legatee of the will as against the devisee of the mansion-house.

Held, that as regards fixtures a claim by an executor against a devisee was on the same footing as a claim by an executor against an heir; that on the evidence in this case the tapestry was a fixture and passed under the devise of the mansion; and that the case fell within the principle of the decisions relating to claims to fixtures as between executor and heir, and was covered by the decision in D'Eyncourt v. Gregory, 15 W. R. 186, L. R. 3 Eq. 382.

Action.

The question in this case was whether certain tapestry on the walls of a room in a mansion-house was a fixture passing under a devise of the house. The facts sufficiently appear from the judgment.

Farwell, Q.C., and T. L. Wilkinson, for the plaintiff.

Byrne, Q.C., and Dunham, for the defendant.

(a.) Reported by RALEGH B. PHILLPOTTS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

CHITTY, J., said:—The question relates to the tapestry on the walls of the room called the "tapestry room" in the family mansion-house of the Dashwoods at West Wycombe. The plaintiff, as executor of the late Sir Edwin Dashwood, claims the right to remove and take away the tapestry as a chattel; the claim is resisted by the defendant Sir Robert Dashwood, as tenant for life in possession of the mansion-house. Both parties claim under the will of the late Sir George Dashwood, who died in 1862; at his death he was entitled to the mansion-house and its contents. By his will he settled the mansion-house so that it passed on his death to his widow for life, and on her death in 1889 to Sir Edwin for his life, and on his death in 1893 to the defendant Sir Robert for his life. He also settled as heirlooms to go with the mansion-house certain articles, part by direct gift, and part through the medium of a selection to be made by his trustees. In the first class he included "all and singular the pictures, prints, drawings, books, statuary, and bronzes" in or about the house at his death; in the second, "such and so many of the household goods, furniture, and other chattels and effects" in or about the house at his death as the trustees should think fit to select. The trustees, who were two in number, caused an inventory to be made of the household goods, furniture, and chattels; both signed the inventory, but at different points for the purpose of showing which of the chattels were to go as heirlooms under their power of selection. Inasmuch as the power was conferred upon them jointly, the result was that so many only of the chattels as were covered by both signatures became heirlooms by virtue of the power, and it was so declared in a former action. By virtue of the will all the chattels in the house not made heirlooms by direct gift or through the medium of selection by the trustees passed to the testator's widow as residuary legatee. After her death certain questions in relation to the real estate and the heirlooms arose between Sir Edwin, as tenant for life in possession, and her executors; an action was instituted in which Sir Edwin was plaintiff and her executors and others were defendants. In certain particulars delivered by Sir Edwin pursuant to an order made in the action he claimed the tapestry as heirlooms under the direct gift, adding, in a marginal note, that they were fitted to the tapestry room and formed portion of the building. Subsequently, and apparently as part of a compromise, the executors of the widow sold to Sir Edwin all the furniture and chattels in the house which she was entitled to sell; the present claim of Sir Edwin's executor to the tapestry is founded on this sale. The tapestry is not mentioned in Sir George's will, nor was it mentioned in the inventory of heirlooms signed by the trustees; and, further, it was not mentioned in the sale. The plaintiff, as executor of Sir Edwin, reversing entirely the position taken up by Sir Edwin himself, now claims the tapestry as part of the furniture and chattels which passed to the widow as residuary legatee, and to Sir Edwin as purchaser from her; as against this claim the defendant, Sir Robert, taking up the same position as Sir Edwin formerly did, contends, first, that the tapestry passed with the house as a fixture, and, secondly, that, if it did not, it passed as an heirloom under the direct gift by virtue of the word "fixtures."

I proceed to consider the question whether the tapestry passed with the house. It results from what I have already stated that the question arises between the devisee of the house on the one hand and the residuary legatees on the other hand, both claiming under the same will. In regard to fixtures and a claim to remove them, the law has regard to the relation of the parties, and differs according to the nature of that relation. It will suffice to mention three sets of cases. As between landlord and tenant the claim of the tenant to remove fixtures set up by himself is the most favoured; as between tenant for life and remainderman the claim of the tenant for life to remove fixtures set up by himself is less favoured; and as between executor and heir, where both claim under the same owner, the claim of the executor to remove fixtures set up by the owner is still less favoured. In former times it has been said that the heir was a favoured person; but in my opinion no distinction can be maintained between a claim by the executor against the heir and a claim by the executor against the devisee. The present case falls within the principle of decisions between executor and heir. In considering any questions of fixtures the important circumstances to be regarded are, first, the mode of annexation of the article and the extent to which it is united with the freehold; secondly, its nature and construction, as whether it has been put up for a temporary purpose or by way of permanent improvement; and, thirdly, the effect its removal will have upon the freehold: see Amos on Fixtures, 3rd ed. (1883), p. 125; and Smith's Leading Cases, 10th ed. (1896), vol. 2, p. 208. The second head, involving purpose or intention, appears to me to have peculiar force when the case arises between executor and devisee. It will readily be perceived that if a man annexes an article belonging to himself to the freehold, an intention or purpose of making the annexation permanent is more easily inferred where the freehold also is his own property than where the freehold is the property of another.

The material facts are these. The tapestry has stood on the walls, as it now stands, for at least a century; the room itself has apparently for the same period been known as "the tapestry room." The room itself is a highly ornamented chamber, and the decoration of the room, including the ceiling, has been designed and coloured with reference to the tapestry, which is the principal ornament. The tapestry itself and the room are well shown in the photographs of the three sides of the room capable of being photographed. The tapestry represents figures of men, women, boys, animals, landscape, and sea. It is thus described in the particulars delivered by Sir Edwin: "Tapestry panel with numerous carts, horses, &c., representing in landscape the Harvest Home; another panel representing Game at Bowls, &c.; another panel representing Fish Market." So Sir Edwin himself speaks of "tapestry panel." Wainscot and its panels pass to the heir (Cave v. Cave, 2 Vern. 508). The tapestry has been cut and pieced so as to fit and cover the spaces in the walls left by the doors and the mantelpiece. This is well shown in the photograph of the wall where the chimneypiece stands. Part of the tapestry lies behind the entablature there shown over the doorway, and to some extent behind the frieze over the mantelpiece. The tapestry appears not to have been designed originally for the room; some additional portions have been added for the special purpose of filling up the wall spaces. Some of the figures on one wall have apparently been copied in the tapestry on another wall. A species of frame following the outline of the wall spaces has been worked in tapestry, so that the tapestry appears to stand in frames. The mode of affixing to the wall is this. Chases have been cut in the plaster right down to the brickwork; into these chases battens two and a half inches broad by three quarters of an inch thick have been placed and securely fixed by strong iron nails firmly driven into the brickwork. The nails, being very old and rusty, are difficult to extract. The tapestry itself is nailed to the battens by old nails, about half an inch long, like modern tacks; these nails are also rusty. The tapestry itself could not be removed from the walls without suffering injury by tearing; the removal of the nails holding the battens to the wall would involve some injury to the brickwork. The removal of the tapestry, the great feature of the room, would, in the language of the Lord Keeper in Cave v. Cave, 2 Vern. p. 508, leave the room "maimed and disfigured." The tapestry if removed would be comparatively of little use or value as a chattel. Underneath the tapestry is a carved dado in wood suitable to the tapestry itself; the dado is affixed by screws. The plaintiff does not venture to claim the dado itself; it is plainly part of the room itself. The tapestry could not be got off the walls without removing the entablature over one of the doors, nor probably without removing the frieze over the chimneypiece.

On the question of permanent annexation, one of the skilled witnesses for the plaintiff admitted that if he desired to fix tapestry permanently to a room he should fix it in the way this tapestry is fixed. The other suggested a cement moulding or something of that description running round the tapestry. The skilled witness called by Sir Robert said that the system actually adopted is that which would now be adopted for permanently fixing the tapestry to the walls.

Upon these facts I hold that the tapestry passed with the devise of the house itself. The case is covered by Lord Romilly's decision in D'Eyncourt v. Gregory, 15 W. R. 186, L. R. 3 Eq. 382. That was a case between tenant for life and remainderman. The method of annexation of the tapestry in that case does not substantially differ from the annexation in the present case. Being of this opinion, it becomes unnecessary for me to decide whether the tapestry would have passed as an heirloom under the word "fixture." Had it so passed it would have vested in a tenant in tail by purchase on his attaining twenty-one. It probably never occurred to the testator when making the careful dispositions found in his will, or to the trustees when they signed the inventory of heirlooms, to doubt that the tapestry passed with the house. But these circumstances form no ground for my decision.

The costs of this question will be the defendant Sir Robert Dashwood's costs in any event.

FREWEN v. LAW LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY. (a.)

Will—Tenant for life—Devise including onerous and beneficial estates.

A testator devised various real estates in England to A. for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male. On some of the estates the charges exceeded the rents and profits, and the assignees of the tenant for life desired to give up possession of these estates while retaining the estates which returned a profit.

Held, that the estates being all given in one gift, the onerous estates could not be disclaimed.

Action.

The testator devised all his manors, lordships, messuages, lands, tenements, and hereditaments of freehold and copyhold tenure situate in six counties, and also nine advowsons and all other his freeholds in England, to trustees for a term of 2,000 years, and subject thereto to his son Edward Frewen for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male, and the testator declared that every estate for life thereinbefore limited should be unimpeachable for waste, and that the trusts of the term of 2,000 years should be to raise by mortgage of the hereditaments comprised in the term the amount required for payment of debts, expenses, and legacies thereinafter bequeathed in aid of his personal estate; and the testator gave his trustees a power of sale over his estate (except the mansion-houses and the lands held therewith), and declared that the net rents and profits of his estate should (so long as the legacies, portions, and money to be raised by mortgage should remain unpaid) be divided into two equal parts, one to be retained by the person entitled in possession to his English estates, and the other to be paid to his trustees, who, after thereout paying interest on mortgages, &c., should therewith form a fund for the payment off of mortgages, legacies, and portions. There were also separate devises of the testator's estates in Galway and County Cork.

The testator died in 1870, and in 1881 the tenant for life effected a mortgage. In 1885 a receiver was appointed, and eventually the tenant for life was foreclosed by the defendants. In 1887 the defendants went into possession of all the English estates. On some of the estates the charges exceeded the amount of the receipts, and the defendants proposed to give up possession of these estates while retaining possession of those estates which returned a surplus. The plaintiff, who was the first tenant in tail in remainder, accordingly instituted this action.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Dauney, for the plaintiff.—The rents of the English estates are given as a whole, and the tenant for life and his assigns are bound to pay interest upon all the existing mortgages, and the surplus arising from one estate must go to keep down the charges upon estates the income of which is less than the charges upon them.

They cited Guthrie v. Walrond, 31 W. R. 285, 22 Ch. D. 573; In re Hotchkys, Freke v. Calmady, 34 W. R. 569, 32 Ch. D. 408.

Vernon Smith, Q.C, and Methold, for the defendants.—There is no liability to apply the surplus rents of one property towards paying the charges upon another property. The case is very like Syer v. Gladstone, 34 W. R. 565, 30 Ch. D. 614. If the security of any mortgagee of the testator is insufficient, such mortgagee has no personal remedy against the tenant for life. His only remedy is to go into possession or obtain payment from the testator's estate. As the tenant for life is not liable to pay, he clearly can give up possession of the onerous estates.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 27.—NORTH, J.—In this case the mortgagees of the tenant for life have entered into possession of the estates, and they propose to give up possession of certain property, while keeping possession of the rest. The will of the testator seems to me of great importance in the matter. The will contains a devise of freehold and copyhold messuages in England to trustees for a term of 2,000 years, and subject thereto to Edward Frewen for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male. The plaintiff is the eldest son of Edward Frewen, and has attained the age of twenty-one years, and is in a position to bar the entail. Then there are separate devises of the Galway estate and the Cork estate, and the residuary personal estate is left to Edward Frewen. The trusts of the term are, as long as mortgages and legacies and charges are unpaid, to pay half the income to Edward Frewen, and with the other half to keep down the mortgages, charges, &c.

(a.) Reported by G. B. HAMILTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The testator died in 1870. The tenant for life effected a mortgage for £12,000 in 1881. In 1885 a receiver was appointed, and in 1887 the defendant was let into possession of all the English estates upon giving an undertaking. On the 9th of November, 1895, the solicitor for the defendant wrote a letter with a statement of the rents of the various properties, and the cases in which the rents do not meet the disbursements. There is over £2,000 a year not included in the specific mortgages, and only subject to the annuities, &c. The charges include an improvement charge, a jointure of £500 a year, seven mortgages for £63,400, and nine mortgages created by the trustees of the term for about £100,000. Of the mortgages created by the testator, in the case of the property mortgaged to Lord Colvile for £30,000, and to Turton for £12,000, the rents are insufficient to meet the charges, and this is also the case in four other instances. In one case, that of Lord Colvile, foreclosure proceedings have been commenced. Many of the charges have nearly expired; for instance, there is an annuity of £1,000 to a lady of seventy-four, and there are improvement charges payable by instalments terminating in 1900 or thereabouts. Some of the mortgagees are willing not to press for their money if the interest is kept down, but if the defendants give up possession of the property and no interest is paid, they will take proceedings. Some of the mortgagees will agree to take less interest than is due under their mortgage deeds, but this will not benefit the estate, as the defendants have taken an assignment of the right to interest at the higher rate.

The plaintiff says that the rents of the English estates are given as a whole, and the tenant for life and his assigns are bound to pay interest upon all the existing mortgages, and that the surplus of one estate must go to keep down other charges. The defendants contend that the properties can be dealt with differently, and that there is no liability to apply the surplus from the rents of one property towards paying the charges of another property. It is clear upon reading the will that the English estates are given as a whole, it is quite impossible to divide the gift, and the tenant for life is bound to keep down the interest.

What is the law upon the subject? In Guthrie v. Walrond, Fry, L.J., says (22 Ch. D., p. 577): "It appears to me plain that when two distinct legacies or gifts are made by a will to one person, he is, as a general rule, entitled to take one and disclaim the other; but that his right to do so may be rebutted if there is anything in the will to show that it was the testator's intention that that option should not exist." In Syer v. Gladstone I cannot find anything in the case to justify the headnote either in 34 W. R. 565 or 30 Ch. D. 614. The judge decided that the life tenants were bound to keep down the interest out of the rent that they received. The interest payable under the mortgage was about £700, the income was less than £300, so £400 had to be provided from some other source. The real decision seems to have been that the life tenants were bound to indemnify the testator's estate to the extent of the value of the proceeds of the house and furniture received by them. In In re Hotchkys Cotton, L.J., says (32 Ch. D., p. 417): "It is true that where two legacies are given to a person by a will the legatee may say, 'I am much obliged to the testator for legacy A, and I will take it; but I decline to take legacy B.' The two things are not connected together so as to be part of the one thing given to the legatee. There are two things given to the legatee, and the legatee is in no way bound to take one if he does not like to take it; but on the other hand he may take the one entire and separate thing which is given him without taking the other. In my opinion it does not at all depend upon the question whether it is given in one sentence or in two sentences; and that will explain the case of Syer v. Gladstone, which was pressed upon us in support of the contention of the tenant for life. In that case there was a gift of property and of certain things on the property. That was a case where there were two bequests, one of land or houses, and the other of chattels. In my opinion there were two separate gifts, of which the legatee might accept one and reject the other. But here what is given to the tenant for life and to the remainderman is an aggregate." Lindley, L.J., too, says (32 Ch. D. 419): "It appears to me that, having regard to the terms of the gift, she is to be considered for the purpose of the construction of this will as having had an aggregate property given to her for her life." Those words are thoroughly applicable to the present case. The testator has given the English property as one undivided whole, and there is no right to split it up. There is a mortgage for £63,000 for which the testator's estate is liable. It is said if the mortgage is insufficient the only right of the mortgagee is to enter into possession of the rents and profits, and that there is no obligation upon the tenant for life to pay the mortgage. I am not satisfied that this proposition is right. The testator charged the estate in the way he has done to prevent the mortgagees from going into possession. I am also not satisfied that the construction contended for is correct. In In re Fitzgerald, 36 W. R. 385, 37 Ch. D. 18, mortgagees who were not parties to a voluntary settlement were held to be cestuis que trustent under the deed, and entitled to the benefit of the provisions for accumulation therein contained. Cotton, L.J., says (37 Ch. D. 23): "Is it right that the trust should be considered as liable to be put a stop to by the owner of the estate? I think not." And this he says he would have held even if he had not thought that the mortgagees were cestuis que trustent. It seems to me to make no difference whether there is an express trust or a devise to one for life with remainder over, carrying with it a well-known legal liability.

The plaintiff is right, and is entitled to have the rents treated as one sum, and not to have them split up.

Land was conveyed by deed in 1885 to three trustees, one of whom was a female. In 1889 the female trustee married. In 1896 the three trustees contracted to sell the property.

Summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874.

(a.) Reported by G. B. HAMILTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By an indenture dated the 3rd of July, 1885, certain property was conveyed to Edith Herbert Hall, spinster, Alfred Reckless, and Herbert Hall as joint tenants upon trust for sale.

Edith Herbert Hall in the year 1889 intermarried with Thomas Harkness.

On the 24th of February, 1896, the trustees contracted to sell the property to Allsopp & Sons (Limited).

This summons was taken out to determine whether the concurrence of Thomas Harkness in the conveyance was necessary, and whether the deed must be acknowledged by Mrs. Harkness under the Fines and Recoveries Act.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Peterson, for the purchaser.—Before the Married Women's Property Act the concurrence of the husband would have been necessary: Avery v. Griffin, L. R. 6 Eq. 606, 16 W. R. Ch. Dig. 141. Section 1 (1) only refers to property to which the married woman is entitled beneficially. Section 18 does not include real estate.

Brinton, for the vendors.—The intention of the Act was that a married woman should be able to deal with all property, whether trust property or not, in the same way as a feme sole. Section 24 makes her solely liable for breaches of trust.

He cited Bathe v. Bank of England, 6 W. R. 612, 4 K. & J. 564, and In re Drummond & Davies' Contract, 39 W. R. 445, [1891] 1 Ch. 524.

Swinfen Eady replied.

NORTH, J.—I have had occasion to consider this point before, and I think that the concurrence of the husband is necessary, notwithstanding the Married Women's Property Act, 1882. Its title is "The Married Women's Property Act, 1882." If a married woman is sole trustee or is one of two or three trustees, how can it be said that the property of which she is trustee is in any way her property? It is not so at all in the ordinary sense of the word.

The phrase "The Married Women's Property Act" is a very good, useful title, and expresses the purpose which the Act was intended to effect. Its object was to prevent the property of ladies being under the control of their husbands as it had formerly been. At one time it was almost entirely so; but by degrees, as the law improved, various devices were resorted to by which the property of a lady was prevented from becoming absolutely the property of her husband, and a day arrived at last on which it was thought desirable to turn the thing round, as it were, and to say that a lady's property should be by law her own property, and not, as it had been, her husband's, unless some special precautions were taken.

This Act was then passed; there was an earlier Act ten years before, but the Act of 1882 went further than anything that had been done before, and, indeed, further than most persons would have thought of going down to the time when it came into operation. It was a long step in advance at the time when the Act was passed, but its object was to prevent a married woman's property from becoming her husband's property. That intention is shown very clearly in the first sub-section of section 1. [His lordship read the sub-section.] A woman is to be capable of acquiring, that is to say, getting the property and having it as hers without the intervention of any trustee. It need not be conveyed to trustees for her separate use, but she may acquire it herself without the intervention of a trustee. If she does so, she may hold it also without the intervention of a trustee, and it is no longer necessary for the law to find a trustee to act for her, or to make her husband into a trustee.

"Separate property" in section 1 (1) means separate from her husband, and she can deal with it as she likes, instead of its being his property to deal with as he likes. To speak of a married woman's separate property when she is a trustee of it, perhaps for another married woman whose separate property it may also be said to be, is not very natural, and is not the mode in which the words are used in this Act. Section 18 goes beyond the general scope of the Act, because the Legislature could not help seeing that a married woman is now more frequently than formerly an executrix, administratrix, or trustee. [His lordship read the section.] It has been suggested that the whole of this section is confined to property of the particular description mentioned in it, but I think that the earlier part of the section is larger, and that a married woman who is an executrix or trustee may sue or be sued whatever the property is of which she is executrix or trustee. But then the section goes on to give directions as to transfer, and the Legislature cannot have intended by the words used to say that the married woman may convey any real estate. A direction that a woman holding property as a trustee may "join in transferring any such annuity or deposit as aforesaid" can only mean that she may do the particular things set out at some length in this section.

It would be most strange that language of this sort should be used, if what was intended was that she may not only sue and be sued in respect of real estate, but may also convey or transfer the real estate accordingly. Some such words would have been used if that was what was meant.

There is nothing in section 24 which helps me very much. It again goes outside the main scope of the Act, and deals with matters in respect of which the married woman is acting as executrix or administratrix. Where a married woman is acting in a capacity which would make her husband liable he is to have conferred on him, to some extent, the same protection from his wife that his wife is receiving from him throughout the Act. In the present case, therefore, the conveyance cannot be made by Mrs. Harkness under the powers given by the Married Women's Property Act without the concurrence of her husband.

HODSON v. HEULAND. (a.)

Specific performance—Parol agreement—Possession prior to agreement—Continuance in possession—Statute of Frauds (29 Car. 2, c. 3), ss. 1, 4.

Where a tenant in possession of premises continues in possession after a verbal agreement for a lease exceeding three years, and such possession is unequivocally referable to the verbal agreement, it is an act of part performance sufficient to take it out of the Statute of Frauds.

Trial of action.

This was an action for specific performance of an alleged agreement by the defendant to grant to the plaintiff a lease of certain premises exceeding three years.

On the 27th of April, 1895, the plaintiff and defendant verbally agreed to the terms, and on the

(a.) Reported by F. T. DUKA, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

30th the plaintiff took possession; and on the 1st of May it was verbally agreed between the parties that the rent originally agreed should be increased in consideration of another portion being added to the premises.

A draft lease was approved on the 8th of May, but not signed by the defendant.

The plaintiff continued in possession and paid rent to the defendant.

In February, 1896, the defendant gave the plaintiff notice to quit as a tenant at will, whereupon the writ in this action was issued.

The term agreed was to be to the 24th of June, 1895, and then for three years more.

Warrington, Q.C., and Elgood, for the plaintiff.—Possession and payment of rent are sufficient acts of part performance: Maddison v. Alderson, 31 W. R. 820, 8 App. Cas. 467; Pain v. Coombs, 1 De G. & J. 34, 6 W. R. Ch. Dig. 83.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Norman Craig, for the defendant.—The possession was not unequivocally referable to the agent. Payment of rent is insufficient for part performance. The plaintiff is only a tenant at will: Nunn v. Fabian, L. R. 1 Ch. App. 35, 14 W. R. Ch. Dig. 119; Humphreys v. Green, 10 Q. B. D. 148, 31 W. R. KEKEWICH, J. [after holding that, on the evidence, there was a concluded parol agreement arrived at on the 1st of May, the terms of which were accurately expressed in the draft prepared by the plaintiff's solicitor], said:—Now, can I enforce this agreement? I think there is possession sufficient as part performance to oblige me to grant relief to the plaintiff. The plaintiff has been and is in possession, and the only difficulty consists in that the agreement was not arrived at till the 1st of May, when the plaintiff was already in possession. The possession being antecedent to the contract no doubt makes a difficulty, and it is argued that the court cannot regard possession taken antecedent to the contract as evidence of that contract, or rather as letting in the consideration of the parol contract within the rules laid down in the cases. The doctrine can be stated in the words of Grant, M.R., in Frame v. Dawson, 14 Ves. 387, as quoted by Lord O'Hagan in Maddison v. Alderson, 8 App. Cas., at p. 484. It has never, so far as I am aware, been said that a continuance of possession cannot be evidence of a parol contract. Very great difficulty has been found, and generally I think insuperable difficulty, in enforcing a parol agreement for the renewal of an existing lease owing to the fact that the tenant is already in possession independently of the proposed new lease. I am not aware that it has been said to be fatal. It is only a difficulty which may and generally is insuperable. The act which amounts to part performance must be unequivocal. If a continuance in possession is unequivocal, why should it not have the same force as a taking of possession? The difficulty lies in that it is more difficult to prove. It is a difficulty not of principle, but of evidence. In the case before me the difficulty is, in my opinion, easily overcome. On the 27th of April the parties were so far agreed that there was every probability of a final agreement, and under these circumstances possession was taken on the 30th of April. On the 1st of May they knew that the terms agreed on the 27th of April were not the terms on which the tenancy was to be continued. It seems to me that if the parties intended to part, that parting ought to have taken place forthwith, and I am bound to conclude that when the plaintiff continued in possession after the 1st of May he did so because on that date the parties had come to a definite agreement. On the 2nd of May he is either a trespasser or a tenant. I do not go into the question of payment of rent, as I think the facts of this case get over the practical difficulties, and that I am bound to enforce the contract on that ground. The plaintiff is entitled to specific performance of the agreement for a lease and to the terms of the draft lease, which I hold express the terms of the parol agreement.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. ANDERSON. (a.)

Intestates' Estates Act, 1884—Escheat—Equitable interest—Proceeds of the sale of real estate directed to be sold under will—Beneficial interest ineffectually disposed of—Intestates' Estates Act, 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. 71), ss. 4, 7.

Under sections 4 and 7 of the Intestates' Estates Act, 1884, the law of escheat applies to proceeds of the sale of real estate directed to be sold under the will.

This was an action on the part of the Attorney-General, on behalf of the Crown, against the executors of Miss E. S. Wood, deceased, to be entitled, inter alia, to the proceeds of the sale of certain freehold property, and for the administration of her real and personal estate. The facts of the case were as follow By her will, dated the 21st of March, 1890, the testatrix devised a certain freehold house to her executors, who were to sell the same as soon as conveniently might be after her decease, and whose receipt for the purchase money should be a good and sufficient discharge to the purchasers thereof; and the testatrix directed that, after payment of the expenses of such sale, the balance remaining should form part of her general personal estate. And she directed that all her just debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and the legacies given by that her will and any codicil or codicils thereto should be paid out of her general personal estate; and, after giving various pecuniary legacies as therein mentioned, she appointed the defendants executors of her will. The testatrix on the 5th of September, 1891, added a codicil to her will, in no way affecting the subject matter of the action, and died on the 20th of November, 1893. Her will and codicil were subsequently proved by her executors. The house was sold, and after the debts and legacies had been paid a balance remained in the hands of the executors, representing in part the net proceeds of the sale of the house. Inquiries were directed in the action, and it was found by the chief clerk's certificate that the deceased testatrix had died without leaving any heir or next of kin.

Sections 4 and 7 of the Intestates' Estates Act, 1884, are as follow:—

4. "From and after the passing of this Act, where a person dies without an heir and intestate in respect of any real estate consisting of any estate or interest, whether legal or equitable, in any incorporeal hereditament, whether devised or not devised to trustees by the will of such person, the law of escheat shall apply in the same manner as if the estate or interest above mentioned were a legal estate in corporeal hereditaments."

(a.) Reported by J. ARTHUR PRICE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

7. "Where any beneficial interest in the real estate of any deceased person, whether the estate or interest of such deceased person therein was legal or equitable, is, owing to the failure of the objects of the devise or other circumstances happening before or after the death of such person, in whole or in part not effectually disposed of, such person shall be deemed, for the purposes of this Act, to have died intestate in respect of such part of the said beneficial interest as is ineffectually disposed of."

Ingle Joyce, for the Attorney-General.—The decision in this case depends on sections 4 and 7 of the Intestates' Estates Act, 1884, and it is submitted that under these sections the Crown is entitled. The will of the testatrix contains no gift of the residue of her general personal, or of her real, estate. Under these circumstances, if she had left an heir, he would be unquestionably entitled to the money as against the executors. Having regard to the words of section 7, it cannot be said that the interest of the testatrix in the sum of money arising from the sale has been effectually disposed of, and consequently the Crown is entitled.

Neville, Q.C., and Ribton, for the defendants.—On a strict construction of the words in the two sections the Crown is not entitled as against the executors. Section 4 deals with the case of a person dying intestate in respect of any interest, whether legal or equitable, in any incorporeal hereditament or of any equitable estate or interest in any corporeal hereditament, but the sum of money that has to be dealt with in this case is the undisposed proceeds of the sale of real estate. The heir would take, but only because there is a resulting trust in his favour; but the estate that he takes is personal estate. The effect of section 7 is to limit the right of the Crown thereunder to real estate.

ROMER, J.—I am of opinion that the Attorney-General's claim is justified, although the sections are not free from difficulty. In my opinion, however, the net proceeds of the sale of the house constituted a beneficial interest in the testatrix's real estate which remained undisposed of under her will within the meaning of section 7. Hence she died intestate as to a beneficial or equitable interest in a corporeal hereditament. There is therefore under her will an equitable interest in a corporeal hereditament undisposed of. Consequently under section 4, which says that to an equitable interest in a corporeal hereditament, whether devised to trustees or not, the law of escheat shall apply if there is no heir, the law of escheat applies to the proceeds of sale.

DICKINS v. GILL. (a.)

Post office—Die for making fictitious stamp—Possession—Without lawful excuse—Post Office (Protection) Act, 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. 76), s. 7 (c).

The respondent had in his possession a die for a fictitious stamp which he used for the purpose of making a representation of a postage stamp in a newspaper published in the interest of stamp collectors. The die was made abroad to the respondent's order.

Held, that the respondent had committed an offence within section 7 (c) of the Post Office Protection Act, 1884, which provides that a person shall not, unless he shows a lawful excuse, have in his possession a die for making a fictitious stamp.

Case stated by the chief metropolitan magistrate.

The respondent appeared to answer an information of the appellant, charging him with having between the 17th of May and the 8th of June, 1895, had in his possession a die for making a fictitious stamp. The proceedings upon the information were for the recovery of the penalty of £20 imposed by section 7 of the Post Office (Protection) Act, 1884.

That section provides that a person shall not (a) make, knowingly utter, deal in, or sell any fictitious stamp, or knowingly use for any postal purpose any fictitious stamp; or (b) have in his possession, unless he shows a lawful excuse, any fictitious stamp; or (c) make, or unless he shows a lawful excuse have in his possession, any die, plate, instrument, or materials for making any fictitious stamp.

Any person who acts in contravention of this section shall be liable on summary conviction on a prosecution by order of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue to a fine not exceeding £20, subject to the like right of appeal as in the case of a penalty under the Acts relating to the excise.

Any stamp, die, plate, instrument, or materials found in the possession of any person in contravention of this section may be seized, and shall be forfeited.

For the purposes of this section "fictitious stamps means any facsimile or imitation or representation, whether on paper or otherwise, of any stamp for denoting any rate of postage, including any stamp for denoting a rate of postage of any of her Majesty's colonies or of any foreign country."

The respondent was a newspaper proprietor and printer carrying on business at the offices of a newspaper known as the Bazaar, Exchange, and Mart. On the 8th of June, 1895 (and previously) he had in his possession a die or instrument received by him from one Van Hoytema, who had received it from the Continent of Europe. The respondent had ordered the die to be made for him for use in illustrating the "Philatelist Supplement" of the Bazaar, Exchange, and Mart newspaper, and it had been made and delivered accordingly. With the said die or instrument imitations or representations of a 2½d. Cape of Good Hope current postage stamp could be produced. It was, however, proved to the satisfaction of the magistrate or admitted that the only purpose for which the respondent had ordered and had in his possession the said die was for making upon the pages of an illustrated stamp catalogue or newspaper illustrations in black and white, and not in the colours of the Cape of Good Hope stamp in question; that such illustrations were intended to appear thereon together with illustrations of other stamps; and that such catalogues were intended for sale only to stamp collectors and others, and as part of a newspaper published for the instruction and amusement of persons buying such paper.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant that the possession of the die or instrument without licence or authority from the Crown was a contravention of the statute, and that the purpose for which the respondent had the die in his possession did not constitute a lawful excuse within the meaning of the statute. It was contended on behalf of the respondent that inasmuch as it had been proved or admitted that the die was only used and intended to be used only for the purpose aforesaid the respondent had shown a lawful excuse for its possession.

The learned magistrate found (a) that the respondent had in his possession a die or instrument capable of making a fictitious stamp; (b) that there were facts which showed absolute bonâ fides in the respondent, and that there was a certainty that the respondent would not use the die for any improper purpose. He thought this was evidence of lawful excuse, and found as a fact that there was lawful excuse, and dismissed the information.

The question for the court was whether it appeared on the evidence as a matter of law that there was no lawful excuse, and that consequently the learned magistrate was not entitled to find as a fact that there was a lawful excuse.

Sir R. B. Finlay, S.G. (Danckwerts with him), for the appellant.—The decision is wrong. The magistrate has treated "without lawful excuse" as meaning "with guilty knowledge"; but the words "lawful excuse" are intended to apply to the case of a Custom House officer or constable seizing a fictitious die.

C. W. Mathews, for the respondent.—This is a question of fact, and therefore the magistrate's decision is final; but assuming it involves a question of law it is right. "Lawful excuse" cannot be construed in the limited sense given to it by the appellant, for "excuse" is not the same as "authority." The two terms are used in this Act in contra distinction, see section 6. The contention of the appellant would involve the committing of an offence by an innocent stamp collector if he has a single fictitious stamp in his collection. That cannot have been intended, therefore the words of the section must mean that innocent possession is a good defence.

Counsel referred to the use of the words "lawful excuse" and "lawful authority" in 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 34, s. 10; 11 Geo. 4 and 1 Will. 4, c. 66, s. 19; 24 & 25 Vict. c. 99, s. 24; and 33 & 34 Vict. c. 58, s. 5.

Sir R. B. Finlay, S.G., in reply.—In the case of an innocent stamp collector there might be a lawful excuse; but this is a very different case. The making of this die was an offence, and the respondent had it made to his order, therefore he cannot have had a reasonable belief that his possession was lawful.

He referred to Reg. v. Harvey, 19 W. R. 446, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 284.

GRANTHAM, J.—In my judgment the respondent has failed to uphold the decision of the magistrate. The case is one of some importance, and therefore it required, and has had, careful argument. I have come to the conclusion that the magistrate has mistaken the meaning of the words "lawful excuse." He has decided, in effect, that as the respondent thought that he was not doing wrong in having this die in his possession, there was a lawful excuse within the meaning of the section. The Legislature has said that a die for making a fictitious stamp shall not be made, and a person contravening that section is liable to a penalty. In this case the respondent had the die made abroad for the very purpose of avoiding that penalty. I think he might have been made liable to a penalty for making the die, but, however that may be, it seems to me very difficult to see how his possession can now be said to be innocent. He has it in his possession for the purpose of showing to the purchasers of the paper what the stamp was like, and for that purpose he made a representation of the stamp, though not in colours. I do not think that is a lawful excuse, for it was wrong for him to have the die in his possession at all.

I do not quite follow the argument of the respondent's counsel as to the inference to be drawn from the use of the word "excuse" and not "authority" in this sub-section, especially as in the present case no "authority" has been, or possibly could be, given. But although a person might be liable to a penalty for making a die without authority, still cases can be imagined in which it would be very hard for persons to be punished for being in possession of that which they did not know to be illegal. In the case of a person buying a fictitious stamp, if he had no means of knowing whether it was good or bad, I think there would be a lawful excuse, not because he thought he had authority to have it in his possession, but simply on the ground that he believed the stamp to be genuine, or did not know it was fictitious. But how can it be said here that the respondent had no knowledge, when he sent abroad for the die because he knew he could not lawfully get it made here? In my opinion the absence of any provision in section 7 as to making "by lawful authority" shows that a strict construction must be put upon the words "lawful excuse."

For these reasons I am of opinion that the appeal must be allowed.

COLLINS, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the act done by the respondent is clearly within the mischief which the statute strikes at. It is obvious that the object is to make it as difficult as possible to do that which by the policy of the law can only be done by the Crown. [His lordship read the section.] In the case of making there is an absolute prohibition, but with regard to uttering it must be done knowingly, because it might possibly be done innocently. Sub-section (b) runs: "Have in his possession, unless he shows a lawful excuse, any fictitious stamp." It seems to me that there again there must be a conscious act, and that what is struck at is a person having a fictitious stamp consciously in his possession, and therefore to make an excuse; but I do not think that it is necessary to deal with the ingenious argument of the respondent's counsel on this point, for even if the fictitious stamp originally came into a person's possession unconsciously, that would be no defence to his retaining it after the fact had been brought to his knowledge. Then we come to sub-section (c), under which the charge is made. It is difficult to imagine a case in which a person unconsciously obtained a die for making a fictitious stamp, and if it is not making a fictitious stamp the offence is not committed. But supposing that a man could buy a die for making a fictitious stamp without knowing that it was fictitious, then comes the moment when the Executive ask him to give it up. If he retains it after that, he commits an offence unless he has a lawful excuse. The excuse set up here is that the respondent wanted for his own purposes to print the stamp in his paper. I do not think that that is a lawful excuse. It is not a question of guilty motive, but the act is one which the Act cannot tolerate, and which is distinctly within the mischief aimed at. I entirely concur in the opinion of my learned brother, and agree that the appeal must be allowed.

POWELL v. BIRMINGHAM VINEGAR BREWERY CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Trade name — Injunction — "Yorkshire Relish" — Probability of deception—Passing off.

Where a man has long been the sole maker of a particular kind of article which he has always called by some name by which his goods are known and usually called by ordinary buyers, if it is impossible for a rival manufacturer profitably to use the old name and at the same time so to distinguish the two classes of goods as to prevent the goods of the rival manufacturer from being mistaken for those of the original manufacturer, the latter will be entitled to protection, and it is not necessary for him to prove fraudulent conduct on the part of the rival manufacturer.

The plaintiff had for a number of years sold a sauce under the name of "Yorkshire Relish," though his trade-mark consisting of those words had been expunged from the register. The defendants began selling, under the name of "Yorkshire Relish," a sauce of their own manufacture which, though not identical with the plaintiff's sauce, was very similar to it. There were considerable differences between the labels on the plaintiff's and defendants' bottles, but the evidence showed that in spite of these differences the defendants' sauce could be and was easily mistaken by ordinary purchasers for the plaintiff's.

Held, affirming the decision of Stirling, J., that the plaintiff was entitled to an injunction restraining the defendants from selling their sauce without better distinguishing it from the plaintiff's sauce.

This was an appeal by the defendants from the decision of Stirling, J., granting a perpetual injunction restraining the defendants from selling a sauce made by them under the name of "Yorkshire Relish" without clearly distinguishing such sauce from sauce made and sold by the plaintiff.

An interlocutory injunction had been granted by Stirling, J., whose decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeal: [1894] 3 Ch. 449, 43 W. R. Dig. 180.

The plaintiff, trading under the name of Goodall, Backhouse, & Co., of Leeds, had for thirty-four years manufactured, under a secret recipe, a sauce which he called "Yorkshire Relish." Other persons during that period had attempted to use the same name for their sauces, but had always been prevented by the plaintiff.

The plaintiff sold his sauce in bottles of one shape in three different sizes.

On the 22nd of April, 1884, the plaintiff registered the words "Yorkshire Relish" by themselves without any addition.

In February, 1893, the defendants took proceedings to remove this mark from the register, and on the 15th of April, 1893, it was removed by Chitty, J., whose decision was affirmed on the 21st of April by the Court of Appeal, and on the 23rd of November by the House of Lords: 41 W. R. 627, [1893] 2 Ch. 388, 399, and [1894] A. C. 8. The ground for this removal was that the plaintiff had not used these words alone as a trade-mark.

There was evidence that the plaintiff's Yorkshire Relish had obtained a large sale all over the world, about six million bottles having been sold by him annually.

Ordinary retail purchasers often asked simply for "Yorkshire Relish" when they wished to buy the plaintiff's sauce.

After the removal of the words "Yorkshire Relish" from the register the defendants, being large makers of sauces under various names, began to use the name of "Yorkshire Relish" for a sauce made by them.

The defendants' sauce closely resembled that of the plaintiff's in appearance, in chemical ingredients, and in flavour, and was described by one of the chemical experts who gave evidence as "a wonderful match," but, as the defendants did not know the recipe of the plaintiff, nor the manner in which the ingredients were compounded, the two sauces were not identical.

The plaintiff's label had a red ground with two blue curved bands across it at the top and bottom, on which were the words "Yorkshire Relish," "Goodall, Backhouse, & Co.," in white, in large letters. Between these was a willow-pattern plate, and there were other words on the label in smaller type stating, amongst other things, that Goodall, Backhouse, & Co. were the makers.

The defendants put on their bottles, which were of the same shape and sizes as the plaintiff's, a white label, with the words "Yorkshire Relish" in a curve like the plaintiff's in gilt letters. Under this were in smaller letters the words "Manufactured by"; then a gilt disc the same size as the plate on the plaintiff's label, and, underneath, the words "Holbrook & Co.," in white letters on a gilt band which is straight, not curved like the plaintiff's.

The plaintiff enclosed his bottles in white wrappers, on the outside of which was printed a willow-pattern plate, with, underneath, in straight lines, "The celebrated Yorkshire Relish, Goodall, Backhouse, & Co." The defendants wrapped their bottles in white, and sometimes in pink paper, outside which was printed the same label which was put on their bottles.

The defendants sent out to retail traders who dealt with them show cards to put in their shops or windows with a red ground, on which were the words "Yorkshire Relish" in a curve, a circle in the middle with the price marked in it in large characters, and, below, "Holbrook & Co., London and Birmingham," but no statement as to who were the manufacturers. Their price lists were headed with the defendants' name and "Sole makers and proprietors of Holbrook & Co.'s sauces and pickles." "Yorkshire Relish" was afterwards printed in large type without any indication there whose make was referred to. The defendants sold their sauce for a less price per dozen than the plaintiff, and it was proved that some grocers, at any rate, retailed it at the same price which they got for the plaintiff's.

Moulton, Q.C., Buckley, Q.C., and Waggett, for the appellants.—The words "Yorkshire Relish" are simply the name of a sauce with a distinctive flavour, and we are entitled to sell such a sauce by that name: Reddaway v. Banham, 43 W. R. 294, [1895] 1 Q. B. 286. The effect of the decision in In re Powell's Trade-Mark is that it is open to us to use the words "Yorkshire Relish" in some way, and the way in which we have used them is such as clearly to distinguish our goods from those of the plaintiffs'. The two articles are, as commercial articles, substantially the same for all practical purposes. The defendants merely wish to be competitors of the plaintiffs in Yorkshire Relish, not to be taken for the plaintiffs'. The plaintiffs have no monopoly in the article or in the name.

Here the defendants' statement is not true. They cannot go further than saying that their sauce is a "wonderful match."

Cur. adv. vult.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an appeal by the defendants from an injunction restraining them from selling a sauce made by them under the name of "Yorkshire Relish" without better distinguishing it from sauce of the same name sold by the plaintiffs. A full report of the case and a careful and accurate summary of the evidence will be found in 12 Pat. Rep., p. 496. The plaintiffs do not complain of the infringement of any registered trade-mark. They rely exclusively on their common law right to prevent other people from making and selling goods which can be and are passed off and mistaken for goods made by them under the name of "Yorkshire Relish." The case is one of very great importance, not only to the parties concerned, but to traders and the public generally.

I will state what I conceive to be the law applicable to such cases generally, and I will then consider the facts of this case in particular. Before there was any legislation on the subject of trade-marks it was well settled that when anyone adopted a mark so closely resembling the trade-mark of the plaintiff as to be likely to be mistaken for it the plaintiff was entitled to injunction to restrain the use of such mark. Fraud on the public to the detriment of the plaintiff was the foundation of the right to damages at common law (per Lord Blackburn in Singer Manufacturing Co. v. Loog, 29 W. R. 699, 8 App. Cas. 15, but as long ago as 1833 it was decided in Millington v. Fox, 3 Myl. and Cr. 338, that intentional deceit was not essential to warrant the court in granting an injunction. The court will interfere to protect a plaintiff if ordinary or unwary purchasers are likely to be misled and to mistake the defendant's goods for the plaintiff's. Nothing can be more emphatic on this point than Lord Cairns' judgment in Singer Manufacturing Co. v. Wilson, 26 W. R. 664, 3 App. Cas. 376 at pp. 391 and 392. [His lordship read the passage referred to, and continued:] In cases of this description the probability of misleading, not experts or persons who know the real facts, but ordinary or unwary customers is the mischief to be guarded against. This point was settled as long ago as 1824 in Sykes v. Sykes, 3 B. and C. 541, and has been recognized ever since. See inter alia in Singer Manufacturing Co. v. Loog, by Lord Selborne, when commenting on the brass plate at one time used by the defendant in that case. Persons may be misled and may mistake one class of goods for another, although they do not know the names of the makers of either. A person whose name is not known but whose mark is imitated is just as much injured in his trade as if his name were known as well as his mark. His mark as used by him has given a reputation to his goods. His trade depends greatly on such reputation. His mark sells his goods. A rival who imitates his mark can hardly help deceiving buyers and injuring him; and for such injury, if proved, he can obtain redress. Siegert v. Findlater (the Angostura Bitters case), 26 W. R. 459, 7 Ch. D. 801, illustrates this, see at p. 807. But it must never be forgotten that a trade-mark only confers on the person whose mark it is a right to say, "Do not imitate my mark in connection with goods like mine so that yours may be mistaken for mine." There is no exclusive right to the mark except in connection with such goods and to prevent deception or mistake. Still less does a trade-mark confer any exclusive right to make or sell the kind of goods denoted by the mark. Unless a person has a patent for his goods, similar goods may be made and sold by anyone; and they may be better or worse, dearer or cheaper, than those denoted by the mark. The mark is only a protection against mistakes in taking one person's goods for another's, and the right conferred by a trade-mark is only to prevent its use if its use deceives or misleads, or is proved to be calculated so to do. The sense in which, and in which alone, a person entitled to a trade-mark has a property in it was fully exlained in the Singer Manufacturing Co. v. Loog, by Lord Selborne at p. 27, by Lord Blackburn at pp. 32, 33, and 37, and by Lord Watson at pp. 38 and 39. [His lordship read these passages, and continued:—] Precisely the same principles are applicable to the use of words as to the use of marks for the designation of particular goods. This is shown by such cases as the Angostura Bitters case, the Glenfield Starch case, the Stone Ale case, the Excelsior White Soft Soap case, Braham v. Bustard, Seixo v. Provezende, 14 W. R. 357, 1 Ch. App. 192. But the exclusive right to the use of words is much more burdensome to other people than the exclusive right to the use of a mark. A person who designs or adopts a mark to denote his goods imposes no unreasonable burden on rivals in trade by forbidding them from using the same mark to denote similar goods if the public are thereby misled. But to monopolize the use of words imposes a much more serious burden. Consequently limits have been put to the right to complain of the use of words which have not been put to the right to complain of the use of marks. For example, if a man uses his own name to denote his own goods, it would be intolerable to confer upon him the right to prevent other people of the same name from honestly using their own name to denote their own goods, even although they might be of the same kind as his and be undistinguishable from them: Burgess v. Burgess, 3 De G. M. & G. 896; Turton v. Turton, 38 W. R. 22, 42 Ch. D. 128. Again, if a person uses words which simply describe the kind of goods he makes or sells—e.g., leather boots—it would be intolerable to confer upon him the right to prevent other persons from honestly using the same words to describe what they make or sell. Although, however, a person by using his own name or a merely descriptive word to denote a particular article cannot prevent other bonâ fide traders of the same name from using it, or prevent other bonâ fide traders making or selling the same sort of goods from using the same descriptive word, yet, even in such a case, if the descriptive name is proved to mean the goods of the plaintiff, and if deception is also proved, a person may be restrained from using such name or word without taking such steps as will render mistakes unlikely to occur. The following are well-known instances: Holloway v. Holloway, 13 Beav. 209; Seixo v. Provezende, Wotherspoon v. Currie (Glenfield Starch); Siegert v. Findlater (Angostura Bitters); Thompson v. Montgomery (Stone Ale). The leading case on this point is Reddaway v.

Banham, ante, p. 638, [1896] A. C. 199. In that case the plaintiffs had made and sold camel's hair belting; the defendants also made and sold camel's hair belting. Both beltings were really made of camel's hair. But it was proved that in the trade camel's hair belting meant camel's hair belting of the plaintiffs' manufacture, and that the defendants' goods were, in fact, sold for the plaintiff's. The Court of Appeal held that the plaintiff was not entitled to an injunction, 43 W. R. 294, [1895] 1 Q. B. 286; but the House of Lords took a different view. Lord Herschell said: "The name of a person, or words forming part of the common stock of language, may become so far associated with the goods of a particular maker that it is capable of proof that the use of them by themselves without explanation or qualification by another manufacturer would deceive a purchaser into the belief that he was getting the goods of A. when he was really getting the goods of B. In a case of this description the mere proof by the plaintiff that the defendant was using a name, word, or device which he had adopted to distinguish his goods would not entitle him to any relief. He could only obtain it by proving further that the defendant was using it under such circumstances or in such manner as to put off his goods as the goods of the plaintiff. If he could succeed in proving this, I think he would, on well established principles, be entitled to an injunction. In my opinion, the doctrine on which the judgment of the Court of Appeal was based—that where a manufacturer has used as his trade-mark a descriptive word he is never entitled to relief against a person who so uses it as to induce in purchasers the belief that they are the goods of the manufacturer who has therefore employed it as his trade-mark—is not supported by authority, and cannot be defended on principle. I am unable to see why a man should be allowed in this way, more than in any other, to deceive purchasers into the belief that they are getting what they are not, and thus to filch the business of a rival." And again Lord Herschell said: "What right, it was asked, can an individual have to restrain another from using a common English word because he has chosen to employ it as his trade-mark? I answer, he has no such right; but he has a right to insist that it shall not be used without any explanation or qualification if such a use would be an instrument of fraud." Lord Macnaghten said: "The appellants concede—they cannot indeed any longer dispute—that everybody who makes belting of camel hair is entitled to describe his belting as camel-hair belting, provided he does so fairly. But they contend, and I think with reason, that neither Banham nor anybody else is entitled to steal Reddaway's trade under colour of imparting accurate, and possibly interesting, information. Practically the only difference which the unexpected turn in the evidence has made is this—the case now comes under the second branch of the proposition laid down by James, L.J., in a passage cited from Singer Manufacturing Co. v. Loog. If camel-hair belting had kept its place as a fanciful term, it would have fallen under the first. The learned counsel for the respondents maintained that the expression 'camel-hair belting' used by Banham was 'the simple truth.' Their proposition was that 'where a man is simply telling the truth as to the way in which his goods are made, or as to the materials of which they are composed, he cannot be held liable for mistakes which the public may make.' That seems to me to be rather begging the question. Can it be said that the description 'camel-hair belting' as used by Banham is the simple truth? I will not call it an abuse of language to say so, but certainly it is not altogether a happy expression. The whole merit of that description, its one virtue for Banham's purposes, lies in its duplicity. It means two things. At Banham's works, where it cannot mean Reddaway's belting, it may be construed to mean belting made of camel's hair; abroad, to the German manufacturer, to the Bombay mill-owner, to the up-country native, it must mean Reddaway's belting; it can mean nothing else. I venture to think that a statement which is literally true, but which is intended to convey a false impression, has something of a faulty ring about it; it is not sterling coin; it has no right to the genuine stamp and impress of truth." Again, if a person makes or sells an article and calls it by a particular name, the use of that particular name by others for the same sort of goods is not necessarily an infringement of his rights, even if the name is not obviously descriptive. If the article is a patented article, sold by the patentee under the name in question, then when the patent expires anyone is at liberty to make and sell the article and to sell it under the name by which it has become known in the market; and if nothing more is done, the patentee has no redress. This was decided in Cheavin v. Walker, 5 Ch. D. 850, 25 W. R. Dig. 294, and Linoleum Manufacturing Co. v. Nairn, 26 W. R. 463, 7 Ch. D. 834. Again, if a person makes an article not patented and gives it a certain name by which the article comes to be known in the market, any one who can make the same kind of article can call it by the name by which it is known, if he can in fact do so without passing off his goods for those of the original makers; see Siegert v. Findlater (the Angostura Bitters case); and Leonard v. Ellis's Trade-Mark, 32 W. R. 530, 26 Ch. D. 288 (the Valvoline case). But no case has yet decided that the name of an article, whether patented or unpatented, can be used in such a way as to pass off his goods for those made by another. In Cheavin v. Walker, in the Linoleum case, and in the Valvoline case there was no deception, and no injunction was granted. In the Angostura Bitters case there was deception, and an injunction was granted; and although there the defendant's bitters differed from the plaintiff's, this only made the deception easier of proof. Braham v. Bustard (the Excelsior White Soft Soap case) is another illustration of the same principle. So is the Camel-Hair Belting case already referred to. There is another way in which a name originally a good trade name may lose its character and become publici juris—i.e., where the first person using the name does not claim the right to prevent others from using it, and allows other persons to use it without complaint. The name then comes to denote the article and nothing more; the name becomes publici juris, and anyone who is at liberty to make the article can call it by the name by which it is usually known. Ford v. Foster, 20 W. R. 311, 818, L. R. 7 Ch. App. 611, is the leading authority on this head. No name, however, can become publici juris in this way so long as the person originally entitled to the use of the name asserts his rights in that respect. Moreover, it is for those who assert that a trade name has become publici juris to prove it (per Lord Cairns in Singer Manufacturing Co. v. Wilson. A more difficult case arises where a man has long been the sole maker of a particular kind of article which he has always called by some name by which his goods are known, by which, in fact, they are usually called by ordinary buyers. A rival trader cannot, of course, adopt the trade name and make up his own articles so as to make them look like or pass for the other's. But if he can avoid doing this there is no law to prevent him from making and selling goods of the same sort as the other's, nor from calling them by the name by which alone they are known in the market. If it be impossible profitably to use the old name and at the same time so to distinguish the two classes of goods as to prevent the rival goods from being mistaken for others, what is to be done? Is the name to be protected and rivalry prevented, or is the rival to be at liberty to use the name and destroy the trade of the old trader? Both principle and authority clearly appear to be in favour of the old trader, if he can prove that the name denotes his goods and that his rival's are in fact mistaken for his. The Excelsior White Soft Soap case and the Angostura Bitters case go far to show this. In the Stone Ale case the difficulty to which I am alluding was commented on by several of the Lords. It was there decided that a brewer at Stone, who had long called his ale "Stone Ale," was entitled to protection against a rival who also brewed ale at Stone and called it "Stone Ale." Whatever doubt there might have been on this matter is now removed by the decision of the House of Lords in Reddaway v. Banham, to which I have already referred, for it was admitted there that camel's hair belting truly described the articles so called. This decision settles the question I am considering in favour of the old trader, if he can succeed in proving his case, which, however, may often be very difficult for him to do. This doctrine, however, is said to lead to this curious result—viz., that an inventor of an unpatented article, to which he gives a name, may be able practically to enjoy a longer monopoly in the name than an inventor of a patented article. But there is nothing anomalous in this. If a man has a secret invention by which he can make an article better or cheaper than other people, he practically has a monopoly in that article until his secret is discovered, or someone else can make a better or cheaper article. There is no limit to the duration of this monopoly. As regards name, when his secret is discovered he is in the same position as a patentee whose patent has expired. In both cases the article can be made and sold under the name by which it is known; but in neither case can such use be made of it as to enable a rival to pass off his goods as those of the original maker. If the use of the name alone renders this unavoidable, the name I apprehend must not be used.

Having now endeavoured to explain the principle applicable to the present case, I pass to the evidence adduced in it. For thirty-five years or more the plaintiffs have made and sold a sauce which they have called "Yorkshire Relish." This term does not describe the nature of the sauce; the words convey no information whatever of its make or qualities. "Yorkshire Relish" is a non-descriptive trade name, and it is very important to bear this in mind. The composition of the sauce and the mode of making it are known only to the plaintiffs and their workpeople, perhaps not even to any one workman. "Yorkshire Relish" has always been sold by the plaintiffs in ordinary round glass bottles of three or four sizes, on which blue and red labels have been fastened. The names of the plaintiffs have always been on these labels, and the words "Yorkshire Relish" have been conspicuously printed on the labels in a curve. The words "Yorkshire Relish" are also impressed into the glass of the bottles in which the sauce is sold. The bottles are sold in wrappers made of white paper, on which "Yorkshire Relish" is printed in large letters. The plaintiffs' trade in "Yorkshire Relish" is very large, and is said to be very profitable. They have spent some £400,000 during the last thirty years in advertising it, but whether alone or with other articles made by the plaintiffs I do not know, nor is it material. They have more than one trade-mark—viz., the label to which I have alluded, and a drawing of an old-fashioned round blue china plate, which is also impressed on the label. Some years ago the plaintiffs registered the words "Yorkshire Relish" as an old trade-mark of their own; but after a long litigation with the defendants these words were expunged from the register on the ground that, although the plaintiffs had long called their sauce by that name, the name alone had not been used by the plaintiffs to denote their goods (41 W. R. 627, [1893] 2 Ch. 388, [1894] A. C. 8). The words "Yorkshire Relish" are not therefore, per se, a registered trade-mark. They remain, however, as they always have been, the most conspicuous and important words on the plaintiffs' labels and wrappers. The plaintiffs have invariably taken proceedings to prevent other persons from using the words "Yorkshire Relish" to denote any sauce made by them, and the plaintiffs have hitherto succeeded in preventing other people from using that name. The term "Yorkshire Relish" cannot therefore be said to have yet become publici juris within the meaning of that expression as applied to trade names, and explained in Ford v. Foster. The evidence plainly shows the value to the plaintiffs of the name of "Yorkshire Relish." The name not only denotes a particular kind of sauce, but it denotes the sauce which the plaintiffs and they alone have hitherto made. Those persons who are in the trade or who read all that is on the labels know that "Yorkshire Relish" is the sauce made by the plaintiffs for which they are famous. At the same time it is true that great numbers of ordinary retail buyers are guided by the words "Yorkshire Relish"; such persons do not attend to anything else on the labels. So long as "Yorkshire Relish" are the conspicuous words, an alteration in the label does not attract the attention of the great majority of buyers, or give rise to any suspicion that the sauce with the altered label is not the same or does not come from the same maker as that which they are accustomed to buy or have been told to ask for. The evidence on this point is very strong; so strong that I doubt the possibility of anyone putting sauce in ordinary round glass sauce bottles with "Yorkshire Relish" conspicuous upon them without misleading the public and seriously injuring the plaintiffs. What might happen if a rival maker of "Yorkshire Relish" sold it in bottles unlike ordinary glass sauce bottles, or in some other vessel wholly unlike the bottles used by the plaintiffs, or at prices so dissimilar as to attract attention, there is no evidence to show. Perhaps it would not be worth anybody's while to attempt to create a trade in "Yorkshire Relish" under such conditions. The defendants having succeeded in removing from the register the words "Yorkshire Relish" as a separate trade-mark, have determined to try and make a sauce like "Yorkshire Relish" and to sell it under that name. They have succeeded in making a sauce so like in appearance, taste, and smell to the plaintiffs' sauce that it is difficult to distinguish the one from the other. But still the defendants have not discovered the plaintiffs' secret, and the sauce made by the defendants is not the same as that sold by the plaintiffs; it is not made from their recipe; and it is not in all respects like the plaintiffs' sauce. The defendants have taken care not to imitate the plaintiffs' label nor their trade-mark of a plate. Moreover, the defendants print their own names in conspicuous letters on their own label, and they now sell their own sauce in pink, and not white, wrappers. They have a round gilt disc instead of a round blue plate. In short, when both the plaintiffs' and the defendants' sauces are looked at as they are sold, the differences between the two are apparent enough to anyone whose attention is drawn to them.

But the resemblances are as conspicuous as the differences. The round disc used by the defendants is a substitute for the plaintiffs' round plate. The bottles themselves are alike in shape, size, and appearance, and the words "Yorkshire Relish" are impressed into the glass. The prices at which the defendants sell to grocers are lower than the plaintiffs' price, but the price paid by the customers to retail grocers is the same—viz., 4½d. for the small bottles. But, above all, the words "Yorkshire Relish" are as conspicuous on the defendants' bottles as on the plaintiffs'. The consequence is that, notwithstanding the differences to which I have alluded, the evidence proves that the defendants' sauce can be, and in fact is, easily mistaken by ordinary buyers for the sauce which the plaintiffs have long made and sold, and still make and sell, under the name of "Yorkshire Relish." This fact is undeniable. I pass over the defendants' price lists and show cards, for, although they are of considerable importance, there is other evidence far stronger which proves the statement I have made. [His lordship referred to the evidence, and continued:—] I cannot, therefore, say that the differences between the bottles as sold are sufficient to prevent mistakes. They do not. What is the legal consequence? It follows from what I have stated in the earlier part of my judgment that the plaintiffs are entitled to be protected. The case falls within the principles acted upon in the Glenfield Starch case, the Excelsior White Soft Soap case, Seixo v. Provezende, Angostura Bitters case, and the Stone Ale case and Reddaway v. Banham in the House of Lords. In most, if not in all, of these cases the defendants took care to put their own names on the goods they sold. So did the defendants in the Singer Manufacturing Co. v. Loog, on the brass plate which they were restrained from using. Great reliance was placed by Mr. Moulton on what Fry, L.J., said in the Angostura Bitters case, Siegert v. Findlater; but the learned judge was there considering whether the defendant could be restained from using those words absolutely, and he came to the conclusion that he could not. This was quite right; for to have granted an injunction to restrain the use of those words simply would have been to go too far. In that very case, however, an injunction was granted, as already stated.

The defendants say that they do not want to pass their goods off for the plaintiffs'; but they do in fact cause them to be so passed off, and, although I have no doubt the defendants do not want to transgress the law, yet they do want to trade on a reputation which does not belong to them and which has been earned by and belongs to the plaintiffs. This is, to say the least, very unfair. It follows from what I have said in the earlier part of the judgment that the plaintiffs are entitled to be protected from what the defendants are doing. Stirling, J., has so decided, and has granted an injunction which is, in effect, an injunction not to restrain the defendants from selling their sauce as "Yorkshire Relish" without any qualification, but to restrain them from doing so without better distinguishing their sauce from the sauce made and sold by the plaintiffs. For the reasons I have already given, my opinion is that the judgment appealed from is right, and that the appeal must be dismissed with costs. I do not shrink from the conclusion that the defendants may find it practically impossible profitably to compete with the plaintiffs in their trade. I do not see the injustice of such a conclusion, nor do I see that the public will greatly, if at all, suffer by it. After all, the defendants' sauce is not what has hitherto been known as "Yorkshire Relish," although the defendants do all they think they safely can to lead people to suppose it is. The defendants can make and sell their sauce as much as they please; they may even sell it under the name of "Yorkshire Relish," if they can do so without misleading buyers and so injuring the plaintiffs. If that is done, the plaintiffs may lose their trade, but no right of theirs will be infringed. But if it is impossible to comply with such conditions and yet profitably compete with the plaintiffs (as probably it is), the defendants must drop the name. Such a possible result was distinctly pointed out by Bowen, L.J., and by myself when this case was formerly before the court: 41 W. R. 627, [1893] 2 Ch. 388, at p. 401. The defendants have had full warning of the difficulties in their way and of the risk they would run if they attempted to do what they have in fact done. They have deliberately tried an experiment, and it has failed.

KAY, L.J.—The defendants appeal from a judgment granting a perpetual injunction to restrain them "from using the words 'Yorkshire Relish,' as descriptive of or in connection with any sauce or relish manufactured by them, or sauce or relish (not being of the plaintiff's manufacture) sold, or offered for sale by them, without clearly distinguishing such sauce or relish from the sauce or relish of the plaintiff," and an account of profits and costs.

The law relating to this subject may be stated in a few propositions: (1) It is unlawful for a trader to pass off his goods as the goods of another. (2) Even if this is done innocently it will be restrained: Millington v. Fox. (3) A fortiori if done designedly, for that is a fraud. (4) Although the first purchaser is not deceived, if the article is so delivered to him as to be calculated to deceive a purchaser from him, that is illegal: Sykes v. Sykes. (5) One apparent exception is that where a man has been describing his goods by his own name another man having the same name cannot be prevented from using it, though this may have the effect of deceiving purchasers: Burgess v. Burgess and Turton v. Turton. (6) But this exception does not go far. A man may so use his own name as to infringe the rules of law. "It is a question of evidence in each case whether there is false representation or not," per Turner, L.J., in Burgess v. Burgess, 3 D. M. & G. at p. 905. So he may be restrained if he associates another man with him, so that under their joint names he may pass off goods as the goods of another firm: Croft v. Day, 7 Beav. 84; Clayton v. Day, 26 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL 43; Melachrino v. Melachrino Egyptian Cigarette Co., 4 Pat. Rep. 215. (7) Another apparent exception is where a man has under a patent had a monopoly for fourteen years, and has given the article a descriptive name, he cannot when the patent has expired prevent another from selling it under that name: Young v. Macrae, 9 Jur. N. S. 322, 11 W. R. Ch. Dig. 111; Linoleum Co. v. Nairn. (8) I am not sure that this would be so if the name so used were the name of the patentee, or even a purely fanciful name not descriptive. (9) Certainly where there has not been a patent and an article has been made and sold under a fanciful name not descriptive, so that the article as made by one person has acquired reputation under that name, another trader will not be permitted to use the name for a similar article made by him: Braham v. Bustard, Cochrane v. Macknish & Son (February 29, 1896, see Times March 2, 1896). (10) To this last proposition there is again a limitation. If the first maker has slept upon his rights and allowed the name to be used by others until it has become publici juris, the court will not interfere. Many of these rules of law and exceptions have been referred to in the present case, and the question is whether it comes within the rules which give protection, or within some one of the exceptions. [His lordship stated the facts relating to the plaintiff's sauce and to the defendants' use of the words "Yorkshire Relish."] They (the defendants) had been warned, especially by the judgment of BOWEN, L.J. (1893, 2 Ch. p. 407), that there would be some risk in doing this, Bowen, L.J., saying: "In this particular case it is perfectly true that 'Yorkshire Relish' denotes the article which is made by and has been made for many years by the appellant's firm, and it looks extremely unlikely that any person, even the respondents, could now use the term 'Yorkshire Relish' without running great risks." [His lordship, after alluding to the evidence and stating that "the resemblances and differences between the two (i.e., the plaintiff's and defendants' labels) seem to me to show plainly that the defendants tried to make such a general similarity between their label and the plaintiff's as might lead an incautious purchaser to suppose, if he noticed them at all, that the plaintiff had made a modification of his label," continued:—] Counsel for the defendants avowed with a candour that was startling that the defendants' object was to obtain a share in the trade in Yorkshire Relish. What in 1893 and 1894 was that trade? It was an enormous sale by the plaintiff alone of his sauce by that name. No one else sold Yorkshire Relish, or, except in the instances which the plaintiff put a stop to, as I have mentioned, had ever done so. Therefore to obtain a share of that trade could only be by selling something which purchasers would believe to be the plaintiff's sauce. The learned judge in the court below seems to have acquitted the defendants of any dishonest intention. I confess I come to the conclusion that the defendants have made a deliberate, careful, and elaborate attempt to pass off their sauce as that of the plaintiff, and to reserve to themselves the usual defence that no one would be deceived who laid the bottles side by side and attentively studied the labels on each. The defendants seem to me to have traded on the well-known fact that the ordinary purchaser never does this. He asks for an article like this by the name "Yorkshire Relish," and probably never notices the name of the maker at all.

Mr. Moulton argued that if the defendants' trading was calculated to pass their goods off as those of the plaintiff they would be restrained even if the sauces were identical, and therefore it was not material whether they were the same or not. I altogether disagree. If, as I think, the defendants intended to pass off their sauce as that of the plaintiff, their conduct is more inexcusable seeing that the two sauces are not the same.

Such trading is in my opinion fraudulent, and ought to be restrained on that ground.

But, supposing there was not such a design as I infer, could the court, acting according to its well-settled rules, allow the defendants to continue to trade in this manner?

The defendants argue that the plaintiff has no right to the exclusive use of the words "Yorkshire Relish," and that to prevent the defendants from using them as they are doing would in effect be to give the plaintiff the exclusive use of those words. That argument has been answered in the words which I have quoted from Bowen, L.J.'s judgment.

In Montgomery v. Thompson Lord Herschell said: "The respondents are entitled to ask that a rival manufacturer shall be prevented from selling his ale under such a designation as to deceive the public into the belief that they are obtaining the ale of the respondents, and he ought not the less to be restrained from doing so because the practical effect of such restraint may be much the same as if the persons seeking the injunction had a right of property in a particular name."

There is evidence in this case that retail traders, when asked for Yorkshire Relish without more, do in many cases—I think eleven instances are given—supply the defendants' sauce, and at the same retail price as is given for the plaintiff's. Moreover, there is evidence that bonâ fide purchasers wanting the plaintiff's sauce have been deceived, and have discovered—in one instance, at least, from the taste—that they have received the defendants' sauce for the plaintiff's. Without this evidence I should have inferred that what the defendants are doing would be calculated to deceive. This evidence confirms that view. Therefore on this ground, if there were no suspicion of fraudulent intention, the plaintiff would be entitled to an injunction.

It was argued that the plaintiff had nothing to do with the deception of the public. The answer is obvious. Every person who, intending to buy a bottle of the plaintiff's sauce, gets instead a bottle of the defendants', is a customer taken from the plaintiff by this deceit, and if this is extensively done the damage to the plaintiff's trade would be serious.

Then does this case come within any of the exceptions to the general rule? The words "Yorkshire Relish" are not descriptive in any sense. They do not relate to the character or quality or geographical origin of the goods. Except that the plaintiff has a manufactory at Leeds which may have suggested the use of the word "Yorkshire," it does not appear why that word was used if not to indicate a peculiar sauce of the plaintiff's manufacture.

The plaintiff never had a patent for this sauce. The exception established in the case of a patentee who had used a descriptive name which has become the name of the patented article during his monopoly has no application here.

It was sought to bring the case within that class where a man has been allowed to use his own name even though the use of it might be calculated to deceive, and reference was made to a decision of the Court of Appeal in Reddaway v. Banham, where a manufacturer of belting for driving machinery composed partly of camel's hair mixed with other materials, called his manufacture "camel-hair belting." Another manufacturer, who made similar belting, adopted the same name, and the court held that he was entitled to do so, because by doing so he was telling the exact truth, his belting being made "substantially" of camel's hair. One difficulty in that case is shown by the word "substantially." "Camel-hair belting" was not an accurate description of either the plaintiff's or the defendant's manufacture. Each contained a proportion of camel's hair, but each might quite as accurately have been called by the name of any other of the substances woven into the belting, and as the plaintiff's belting had become known by a name which did not perfectly describe it, such name might be considered an arbitrary name which could not well be used by a rival manufacturer without passing off his goods as those of the plaintiff. The case was appealed to the House of Lords, and has been reversed, the Lord Chancellor holding that although the name was descriptive the use of it enabled the defendant, according to the evidence, to pass off his manufacture as that of the plaintiffs, and that therefore an injunction should be granted.

None of the exceptions to the general rules of law that no one should trade so as to pass off his goods as those of another person seems to me to apply to this case.

The authority most nearly in point is Braham v. Bustard. The plaintiff there had manufactured a new article to which he gave the name of "Excelsior White Soft Soap." It was proved to the satisfaction of the court that the plaintiff's goods, and their goods only, were known in the market by that name from December to June, about six months, and the defendant was restrained from using the same name for soap manufactured by him. The Vice-Chancellor distinguished Young v. Macrae, because it was proved that paraffin oil was and had long been known as the scientific name of the article. This has been followed in the Privy Council on the 29th of February, 1896, in Cochrane v. MacNish & Son, where in an appeal from Jamaica the use of the words "Club Soda" was restrained where the plaintiff had used those words since 1887 for soda water manufactured by him in Ireland and sold in Jamaica.

The form of the injunction in this case follows that approved in the House of Lords in Johnston v. Orr Ewing, 28 W. R. 330, 30 Ibid. 417, 7 App. Cas. 219.

For the reasons which I have given I think that this appeal should be dismissed, with costs.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—This is an appeal from a judgment of my brother Stirling, who granted a perpetual injunction restraining the defendants from using the words "Yorkshire Relish" as descriptive of, or in connection with, any sauce or relish manufactured by them without clearly distinguishing such sauce or relish from the sauce or relish of the plaintiff.

In my judgment the real question to be decided in this case is one of fact, which is, Has the plaintiff established that the defendants have been passing or attempting to pass off, or enabling others to pass off, their goods in such a way as to be calculated to lead purchasers to believe that when purchasing the defendants' goods they were purchasing the plaintiff's? If this be proved, the plaintiff, in my judgment, is entitled to the injunction he has obtained.

The proved facts are these. Some thirty-four years prior to the year 1894 the plaintiff commenced making, from a secret recipe, a sauce which he called by the name of "Yorkshire Relish." This was a name which he invented for the occasion. It described no ingredient nor peculiarity of the sauce, nor indicated the maker's name, it was nondescriptive of the sauce, and was, in my opinion, purely a fancy name given to the sauce which the plaintiff was then about to bring out and place upon the market. The plaintiff has ever since continued to make and sell his sauce under this name, and has expended in advertising the sum of £400,000 in the thirty-four years; and by this and other means he has built up a trade of great repute and of enormous dimensions throughout the world, having sold in the year 1893, which was the last year before the defendants began their present operations in Yorkshire Relish, no less than six millions of bottles. For the last thirty-four years the plaintiff has alone made sauce composed of his secret recipe which was known to the public as "Yorkshire Relish." The plaintiff has always printed upon the wrappers of his bottles in large type, "The Celebrated Yorkshire Relish—Goodall, Backhouse, & Co., Leeds," which last was the name under which he traded, with a medallion of a willow plate thereover; and also upon the labels upon his bottles, "The Celebrated Yorkshire Relish, prepared and sold wholesale by Goodall, Backhouse, & Co., Leeds." There was also a like medallion upon the label, which was upon a blue and red ground.

In the year 1884 the plaintiff registered the words "Yorkshire Relish" as a trade-mark, but this registration was in the year 1893 expunged from the register at the instance of the defendants. They had not at this time sought to make a sauce in competition with the plaintiff, but it was held that they were "parties aggrieved" within the meaning of the statute, and also that the trade-mark registered by the plaintiff was invalid. It is not necessary to refer to the reasons, for they are immaterial to this case. It is sufficient to say that the case went to the House of Lords, which affirmed this court, which had affirmed Chitty, J., in so holding. It is not suggested by the plaintiff that he has any right under any statute to the exclusive use of the words "Yorkshire Relish," nor that he has any right at law to a monopoly in the words; but what he asserts is that the defendants have been passing and are attempting to pass off, and enabling others to pass off, the defendants' sauce as the sauce of the plaintiff, under such circumstances as are calculated to deceive purchasers.

It was well known to all connected with the sauce trade that "Yorkshire Relish" denoted sauce manufactured by the plaintiff. What the defendants have done is this. In the year 1894 they commenced making a sauce, which appears from the evidence to be as regards taste, when used upon food, about as like to the plaintiff's sauce as they could well make it without knowing the plaintiff's secret recipe; but the evidence shows that it certainly is not the same sauce, but a different sauce from the plaintiff's. Not one of the defendants' witnesses could say that it was the same sauce, one saying that it was "a wonderful match," and this I take to be the truth. The defendants put their sauce into bottles of similar size and make to that of the plaintiff's bottles, and upon the wrappers and labels of their bottles they printed in large type the words "Yorkshire Relish," and underneath, "Manufactured by the Birmingham Vinegar Brewery Co., successors to Holbrook & Co.," with a medallion in the centre; and then they altered it to Holbrook's Yorkshire Relish, with a medallion above, "Manufactured by the Birmingham Vinegar Brewery Co." This wrapper of the defendants is now made of pink paper; at first it was made of white paper. The plaintiff's wrappers are of white paper. The label upon the defendants' bottles has a white ground, the plaintiff's label has a blue and red ground. It appears from the evidence given, as also from the evidence afforded by the eye (which upon such a matter I prefer to other evidence, except that of pointing out the similarities or dissimilarities), that the bottles of the defendants are similar to the bottles of the plaintiff, but that the wrappers and labels of the defendants, excepting for the words "Yorkshire Relish" printed thereon in large letters, are unlike the wrappers and labels of the plaintiff. There are also other differences; for instance, the stoppers of the defendants' bottles and labels thereover are dissimilar. The medallion upon the defendants' wrapper and label was said to be like to the willow pattern plate medallion upon the plaintiff's, though I do not think it is; but I need not refer further to these dissimilarities or similarities, for in my judgment this is not the point upon which the case has to be determined. If it had been, I may say that I agree with the evidence obtained out of the plaintiff's own witnesses upon cross-examination, that if all purchasers of "Yorkshire Relish" sauce looked at the wrappers or labels of the defendants they would see that what they were buying was Holbrook's "Yorkshire Relish," and not Goodall, Backhouse, & Co.'s "Yorkshire Relish."

But although this is so, it is said by the plaintiff that the evidence shows that large numbers of those who purchase "Yorkshire Relish" sauce were not only likely to be deceived, but in fact many had been deceived, by what the defendants were doing, and I will deal with this evidence hereafter.

It is not denied that for thirty-four years down to 1894 the plaintiff was the sole maker of the sauce known as "Yorkshire Relish," excepting upon occasions when others sought to imitate it and to sell their imitations under such circumstances that they were promptly stopped by injunctions obtained by the plaintiff. There is no pretence for saying that the name had become publici juris.

Mr. Moulton, when asked what it was that prompted his clients to take for their sauce the name of "Yorkshire Relish," and to give the name such prominence upon their wrappers and labels, and why they were not content to call their sauce either "Holbrook's Sauce" or "Holbrook's Relish," or by the name of any other relish they might choose other than "Yorkshire Relish" (and there are many other relishes known in commerce), at once boldly stated that the defendants' object was (and indeed it was obvious without his statement) to compete with the plaintiff in his sale of "Yorkshire Relish"; and he said that by law the defendants were entitled to do so, for the only right which the plaintiff had was that no one should sell his sauce as the sauce of the plaintiff, and that what the defendants were doing was to trade, not in Goodall, Backhouse, & Co.'s "Yorkshire Relish," but in Holbrook's "Yorkshire Relish," and thus to do a service to the public.

I agree that fair and honest competition in itself is lawful and beneficial to the public; but when a trader avows that his object in taking an old well-known fancy name of an article of high repute and of vast value is to cut into the established trade of another and undersell him if possible, which is in fact what the defendants are attempting to do in the present case, he must be careful when he so acts to the injury of the other that it cannot with truth be said that he is attempting to pass off his goods as the goods of the other.

As I have already said, in my opinion, the wrappers and labels of the defendants are in themselves distinct from the wrappers and labels of the plaintiff, but the defendants have throughout taken and given great prominence to the words "Yorkshire Relish" for reasons which can easily be surmised, and the question is, can they by law do so?

There is good evidence in this case, looking to the way the defendants have acted, the closeness with which they have throughout been sailing to the wind, by which I mean going as near to the plaintiff's wrappers and labels as they dared to go, and then giving way and resorting to other devices, to their price lists and their show cards, to the fact that they have taken the well-known fancy name by which the plaintiff's sauce has ever been known; there is good evidence, I say, from which a judge if so minded would have been well warranted in finding that the defendants in what they have done intended to pass off their goods as the goods of the plaintiff. I cannot doubt that this is so.

I do not, however, recapitulate this evidence which Mr. Graham Hastings called our attention to, for the learned judge has not based his judgment upon the ground of intention to deceive, but upon the ground that the defendants' acts were calculated to deceive; which, of itself, is sufficient to support the injunction, irrespective of whether there was an intention to deceive or not.

Now, as to whether the defendants' acts were calculated to mislead purchasers, the evidence in my judgment is irresistible.

It establishes first of all, as above stated, that during thirty-four years prior to 1894 the name "Yorkshire Relish" denoted the sauce which during that period had been manufactured by the plaintiff and by no one else. It establishes that a large class of consumers of "Yorkshire Relish," as well as many retail dealers, for many years have been accustomed to purchase the plaintiff's sauce by the name it was so well known to them all by—viz., "Yorkshire Relish," wholly irrespective of wrappers or labels, and in many cases of the name of the maker. It establishes that "Yorkshire Relish" is what they have asked for, and the plaintiff's "Yorkshire Relish" is what they have been always theretofore supplied with until the defendants put their substitute upon the market, when the consumers got the defendants' manufacture in the place of the plaintiff's manufacture. It was established that the defendants' methods not only were likely to deceive purchasers, but proof was given of actual deception. [His lordship referred to cases of actual deception, and continued:—] These cases the learned judge believed, and I do not doubt he was right when he did so. In each of these cases "Yorkshire Relish" was what was asked for, obviously meaning the old well-known condiment, and the applicants got in its place the new sauce made by the defendants. It was also proved that grocers in numerous cases (some ten uncontradicted test cases), when asked to supply over the counter "Yorkshire Relish," supplied the defendants' sauce; and it may be added that by so doing they made a larger profit than they would have done had they supplied the plaintiff's sauce, inasmuch as the defendants supplied their sauce, which they called "Yorkshire Relish," to the grocers at 3s. per dozen, the plaintiff's "Yorkshire Relish" being invoiced to the grocer at 4s. 3d. per dozen, the same price in each case being charged to the customer.

Mr. Buckley sought to evade the mass of evidence which was given upon these heads, not by contradiction, for the evidence was really all one way; but by arguing that the purchaser was not deceived, because he did not purchase "Yorkshire Relish" as being made by the plaintiff, but only "Yorkshire Relish" of a particular taste, or, as he said, as being the name of a particular article which tickled the palate in a particular way, and that was all the purchaser cared for, and that was what he got when supplied with the defendants' sauce; and he also said that, as to taste, the defendants' "Yorkshire Relish" was similar to, if not identical with, the plaintiff's "Yorkshire Relish," and therefore the purchaser, having got what he had asked for, was not deceived.

In my judgment, the facts do not warrant this argument, for what the purchasers in truth asked for was either the old "Yorkshire Relish" made by the plaintiff, which they had been accustomed to buy, or, if they did not know the plaintiff made it, then for "Yorkshire Relish" made by the same maker, whoever he might be; and instead thereof they got the new manufacture of the defendants. Every bottle so supplied was a loss to the plaintiff.

Whether the taste of the defendants' sauce was the same as the taste of the plaintiff's sauce I very much doubt, and indeed to my mind there is good evidence that it was not; and I say that the weight of the evidence showed that the defendants' sauce was more salt than the plaintiff's, though I have no doubt the defendants made their sauce as like the plaintiff's as they possibly could without knowing his secret recipe. In many cases it passed muster, in others it did not. That the acts of the defendants were calculated to deceive purchasers has, in my judgment, been clearly established. But it was argued by Mr. Moulton that the defendants used the words "Yorkshire Relish" in the least objectionable way possible, and that as the plaintiff had at law no monopoly in the words, the defendants were entitled to take them and use them as they have done. This is not, I would point out, the case of a man making the identical article which another has made and called by a fancy name, but it is the case of a man making another article and calling it by the same fancy name.

Whether in the first case he could do so if it tended to mislead, I have not now to decide, but I very much doubt it, and I think he could not. The question here is whether in the second case he could do so.

Suppose that the words "Yorkshire Relish" have obtained such a significance in the market that it is impossible, either by dressing them up or by coupling them with other words, to render them innocuous and incapable of misleading buyers, what then? Are the defendants entitled to take and use this well-known fancy name, denoting the plaintiff's goods, and thereby filch from the plaintiff his old-established trade, or must they leave the fancy name alone? This, in my judgment, is the point in this case. Mr. Moulton says that even so the defendants may take the name, but I am of opinion that this is not so, and that they must leave the name alone if they cannot render it otherwise than misleading to purchasers. It may be that the result of such a state of things is that it gives to the plaintiff a practical monopoly in the words which otherwise he would not have, and it appears to me, so far as the evidence as to this in the present case goes, that this is so.

Whether it is possible to mask the words "Yorkshire Relish" so that they will become innocuous, such as by selling "Yorkshire Relish" in jars or tins or barrels, I do not know, but it would seem that if this be possible, and it be done so that the words do not mislead, then the object which I have no doubt the defendants have in using the words will be thereby frustrated.

It is said that this puts the plaintiff in the same position as if he had a registered trade-mark or a patent unexpired, but this point was dealt with by three of the learned lords in the House of Lords in the Stone Ale case (Montgomery v. Thompson). In that case, as in the present, the plaintiff had no monopoly in the words "Stone Ales." Lord Herschell said: "The respondents (i.e., the plaintiffs) are entitled to ask that a rival manufacturer shall be prevented from selling his ale under such a designation as to deceive the public into the belief that they are obtaining the ale of the respondents, and he ought not the less to be restrained from doing so, because the practical effect of such restraint may be much the same as if the persons seeking the injunction had a right of property in a particular name"; and Lord Watson doubted the possibility of the words "Stone Ales" in that case (which had a history very similar to the words "Yorkshire Relish" in this) being taken, and Lord Macnaghten pointed out that "it would have been impossible for the defendant to have called his ales 'Stone Ales,' and to have distinguished his ales from those of the plaintiff's. Any attempt to distinguish the two, even if honestly meant, would have been perfectly idle."

The difficulty the defendants now find themselves in, in attempting as they are doing to obtain the benefit of the well-known fancy name of the plaintiff, "Yorkshire Relish," for their "Yorkshire Relish," was clearly pointed out to them by Bowen, L.J., when they were applying to have the plaintiff's trade-mark expunged. Bowen, L.J., then said: "In this particular case it is perfectly true that 'Yorkshire Relish' denotes the article which is made by, and has been made for many years by, the appellant's firm, and it looks extremely unlikely that any person, even the respondents, could now use the term 'Yorkshire Relish' without running great risks. But if 'Yorkshire Relish' is not a term to which the appellant has the exclusive right, it is conceivable that the respondents or any other persons in the trade might, by an honest and strong endeavour, carried out effectually, so distinguish the sale of the article which they are selling from the sales of the appellant's sauce, or so distinguish the manufacture of the article which they manufacture from the manufacture of the appellant's sauce, as to prevent the possibility of an outside customer being deceived. It is impossible for a court of law to say that it might not be done, and if it can be done the trade have a right to have that door left open to them."

The door was thus left open to the defendants with this warning, and it appears to me clear, upon the evidence which has been given in this case, that the defendants, although they have used all sorts of contrivances by which to use the words "Yorkshire Relish" so as to be of use to them, yet have not, by what they have done, prevented the public from being deceived, for the large body of evidence given upon this point, which the learned judge has rightly believed, shows that it is otherwise, and that the defendants, by what they have been doing, have caused their goods to be sold as the goods of the plaintiff.

Since writing this judgment the case of Reddaway v. Banham has been decided in the House of Lords. The present is an a fortiori case, for in Reddaway v. Banham the words "camel's hair belting" were admitted to be descriptive of the article sold, and not a mere fancy name given to an article by which it has become known to the public, and yet it was held that a rival in trade could not use the name if by so doing he represented his goods as the goods of another.

SEAWARD v. DENNINGTON. (a.)

Practice—Discovery of documents—Landlord and tenant—Demise—Forfeiture—Action to recover possession of demised premises.

The defendant in an action to recover possession of demised premises on a forfeiture for breach of covenant may be ordered to make an affidavit of documents, but he may refuse to disclose any documents which would establish the case of forfeiture against him.

Appeal of the defendant from an order of Bruce, J., at chambers.

The action was brought by a lessor against a lessee to recover possession of the demised premises on a forfeiture for breach of covenant. The plaintiff also claimed mesne profits and damages.

The master ordered the defendant to make the common form affidavit of documents.

On appeal, Bruce, J., affirmed the master.

The defendant appealed.

Beddall, for the defendant.—This is an action for ejectment founded on forfeiture. Such an action is, with regard to discovery of documents, on the same footing as an action for a penalty (see per Bowen, L.J., in Redfern v. Redfern, 39 W. R. 212, [1891] P. 139), and therefore the defendant cannot be ordered to make an affidavit of documents.

T. Willes Chitty, for the plaintiff, was not called upon.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The defendant's contention is a novel one to me. I agree that it has been the practice ever since the time of Lord Hardwicke that in an action for penalties the court will not assist the plaintiff by ordering the defendant to make discovery.

This case, however, is not an action for a penalty, but is an action to recover possession of demised premises after a breach of covenant; and though the defendant is not bound to disclose to the plaintiff circumstances which will enable the plaintiff to make out a case of forfeiture, nevertheless the defendant is bound to make an affidavit of documents. But when he does so he can protect himself by covering particular documents. That was decided in Pye v. Butterfield, where it was attempted without success to make the defendant answer an interrogatory which might subject him to a forfeiture of his interest as lessee.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

REG. v. VESTRY OF ST. MATTHEW'S, BETHNAL-GREEN. (a.)

Metropolis management—Sewer—Drain—Liability to repair—Combined system of drainage—Drain made without order of vestry—Metropolis Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), ss. 68, 69, 250.

The fact that a sewer has been unlawfully made does not prevent it vesting in the vestry or district board of works under section 68 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, so as to become repairable by them under section 69.

A drain for draining a group of houses by a combined operation was made without an order of the vestry;

Held, that the drain so made was a "sewer" within the definition in section 250 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, so as to vest in and be repairable by the vestry.

Decision of the Divisional Court, ante, p. 559, affirmed.

Appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., and Wright, J.) making absolute a rule nisi for a mandamus (reported ante, p. 559, [1896] 2 Q. B. 95).

In 1894 the London School Board acquired certain land with houses on it in the defendants' district. In 1866 a system of drainage was laid down by the owner of these houses, the sewage from the houses being carried by a pipe into a sewer in an adjoining street. It did not appear that the previous approval of the Metropolitan Board of Works or of the Vestry had been obtained for its construction. The Vestry having declined to repair this pipe on the ground that it was not a sewer vested in them, the court, on the application of the School Board, made absolute a rule for a mandamus, directing the Vestry to repair the pipe.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Sir Edward Clarke, Q.C., and Jelf, Q.C., (Beven with them), for the appellants.—No person can make a sewer without the consent of the Vestry and of the Metropolitan Board of Works: sections 47 and 48 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1862. This pipe is either a sewer wrongfully made because not made with the sanction of the Vestry, and therefore does not vest in the Vestry; or it is a drain for draining a group of houses by a combined operation, and, as it must be assumed that it was done lawfully, the court will infer that it was done under the order of the Vestry, and is therefore a "drain" within the definition in section 250 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855: Bateman v. Poplar District Board of Works, 33 Ch. D. 360, 35 W. R. Dig. 131.

R. Cunningham Glen, for the respondents, referred to Kershaw v. Taylor, ante, p. 28, [1895] 2 Q. B. 471; St. Martin's Vestry v. Bird, 43 W. R. 194, [1895] 1 Q. B. 428.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—It seems to me that this case raises a question of fact and a question of law. The question of fact must be what is the proper inference from certain circumstances. In my opinion the facts and circumstances in this case do not admit of the inference that this pipe was lawfully laid down. It is much more likely that it was done unlawfully. I cannot doubt that in real truth the builder who laid out this land laid down this pipe without any lawful authority. That is the question of fact. I come now to the question of law, the construction of the sections of the Act. I must first begin with section 250 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, and see what this contrivance is to be called. That section defines what is to be called a drain and what is to be called a sewer. Is this contrivance a drain or a sewer? It drains more than one house. It is said that it is a drain for draining a group of houses by a combined operation, and is therefore not a sewer. But the section goes on to provide that in such a case it is to be a drain if it is done under the order of the vestry. The section then provides that "sewer" shall mean and include sewers and drains of every other description. If, then, this pipe is not a drain as defined by that section, it is a sewer. It must be one or the other. Therefore this pipe is a sewer unless it was laid under an order of the Vestry. This, again, is a question of fact. Can we say that it was so done? The pipe has been in existence for thirty years, and if we had to consider that fact alone we might perhaps infer an order. But there is no minute of any such order. If there had been such an order, something would be known of it. It would be contrary to the truth to say that there was an order. Therefore this combination drain dealing with the sewage of more than one house without an order of the Vestry for that purpose is a sewer, and not a drain. The builder made this sewer. If he had laid the plan of it before the Vestry for their sanction, there would be some record of it. It is clear that he never laid any plan before the Vestry, and he thereby contravened section 47 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1862. He did what was wrong, but he made a sewer as defined by section 250 of the Act of 1855. The Vestry must have known of this sewer and of its connection with their principal sewer, and they allowed it to remain for thirty years. Therefore this sewer was made by a private person contrary to section 47 of the Act of 1862, and therefore wrongfully made, and allowed to remain without objection by the Vestry. Does that sewer vest in the Vestry under section 68 of the Act of 1855? That section says that "all" sewers shall vest. Therefore this sewer, though wrongfully made, vested in the Vestry, and they must repair it. The judgment of the Divisional Court was therefore right, and this appeal must be dismissed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—We are again involved in the intricacies of those statutes relating to drains and sewers. The application is for a mandamus to the Vestry to maintain and repair the sewer. The first answer is that it is not a sewer. The reply to that is that it is a sewer, because the pipe takes the sewage of more than one house, and comes therefore within the definition of a sewer in section 250 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, and that therefore the case comes within the decisions in Vestry of St. Martin-in-the-Fields v. Bird and Kershaw v. Taylor. As against that it is said, "No, it is not a sewer; it is a drain for draining the group of houses by a combined operation within section 250." The answer made to that contention is that in order to make it a drain for draining a group of houses by a combined operation it must have been done under an order of the Vestry, and there is no such order here. Is this a combination drain? It lies on the parish to show that it is. Primâ facie it is a sewer within the definition in section 250. There must be an order of the Vestry to make it a combination drain. No such order can be produced, and I cannot infer one, because it seems to me much more likely that a builder thirty years ago would lay this pipe without any order at all than go through all the formalities required by sections 47 and 48 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1862. Another point struck me somewhat forcibly at first—namely, that this case is differentiated from Kershaw v. Taylor, because the attention of the court was not called in that case to the proviso in section 69 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855. I do not agree with that contention. Section 68 vests all sewers in the vestry or district board of works, except certain sewers which are vested in the Metropolitan Board of Works, and it provides that all sewers made and to be made within any such parish or district, except sewers vested or to be vested in the Metropolitan Board of Works, shall be vested in such vestry and board respectively. Made by whom? There is no limitation. The section does not limit it to sewers made by the vestry or district board. When a person has made a sewer, though he has not gone through the formalities required by the Act of 1862, that sewer, whether lawfully made or not, vests in the vestry or district board. Section 69 requires the vestry or district board to repair all sewers vested in them, and to make new ones, and then comes the proviso that no new sewer shall be made without the previous approval of the Metropolitan Board of Works. Made by whom? The proviso deals entirely with sewers made by the vestry or district board, and not with those made by any other person, which even now can be made by that other person if the requisite consents are obtained. Therefore I think that the point taken, that this case is differentiated from Kershaw v. Taylor, is not a good one. In my opinion this pipe is a sewer within section 250 of the Act of 1855.

Decision of Chitty, J., ante, p. 459, [1896] 1 Ch. 894, affirmed.

Appeal from Chitty, J. (reported ante, p. 459, [1896] 1 Ch. 894).

The defendants, who were colliery owners, claimed to be entitled to certain land near their colliery by virtue of an alleged agreement, which agreement was held in fact not to have existed.

By the judgment it was declared that the land belonged to the plaintiffs, who were the trustees of Mr. Benjamin Piercy, the former owner, who died in March, 1888. It was also held that the defendants had committed a trespass upon the land by tipping or depositing thereon spoil from their colliery. An injunction was granted to restrain any further deposit. The defendants were ordered to give up possession to the plaintiffs, and an inquiry as to the damages to be paid by the defendants was directed. The form of the inquiry left open the question of the measure of damages.

In answer to the inquiry the official referee made a special report. He found, first, that the sum proper to be paid by way of damages was £200; secondly, that the defendants had by their trespasses rendered land belonging to the plaintiffs, 1a. 3r. 9p. in extent, valueless for any but tipping purposes; and, thirdly, that in assessing the £200 he had taken as the measure of damage the diminished value of the plaintiffs' land, in extent 1a. 3r. 9p., caused by the defendants' trespass. In arriving at the £200 the referee appeared to have taken the land at its agricultural value. The plaintiffs had contended that the proper measure was the reasonable value of the land for tipping purposes, those being the purposes for which the defendants actually used the land. The referee found that, if the proper measure of damages was that for which the plaintiffs had contended, the sum to be paid was £963 and £141 5s. for interest, making together £1,104 5s.

The plaintiffs' land was situate in a long, narrow valley to the north of the defendants' colliery, which was a short distance off. There was no other land on the north of the colliery within a reasonable distance which the defendants could have procured for tipping purposes. The sum of £963 was arrived at by treating the tipping value at £500 an acre, the value of land in the neighbourhood for building. Of the total area of the land 3r. 20p. had been covered by the defendants with spoil; the remaining portion, 3r. 29p., was still available for tipping purposes, but for no other purpose. The question was whether the official referee ought to have taken into consideration the value of the land to the defendants for tipping purposes.

Chitty, J., held that the plaintiffs were entitled to damages on the basis of the value of the land to the defendants for tipping purposes in respect of so much of the land as was actually used by the defendants for tipping, and as to the rest of the land on the basis of its ordinary value, but without any interest.

Assuming that Chitty, J., had laid down the correct principle, the counsel for the parties had agreed that the proper sum to be paid by the defendants to the plaintiffs would be £550.

The defendants appealed.

The arguments used were the same as those in the court below.

C. A. Russell, for the appellants.

F. Thompson, for the respondents.

LINDLEY, L.J.—We are all agreed as to the principle which ought to be applied, and we are of opinion that that upon which Chitty, J., acted is the right one. In order to make it plain, let us see what the defendants have done. They have done two things. First of all, they have so used the plaintiffs' land as to diminish its value by £200, and their counsel admits that they must pay that sum at least, but he contends that they need pay no more. That leaves out of sight what the defendants have done in addition. Besides diminishing the value of the land, they have also been using it for years. Why should not the plaintiffs be entitled to compensation in respect of that user? They have been injured in two respects; they have had the value of the land diminished, and they have lost the use of the land, whilst the defendants have had the use of it.

If we arrive at that point, it does appear to me to be unjust to leave out of sight the use which the defendants have made of this land for their own purposes; and that lies at the bottom of what are called the wayleave cases. What is the principle of those cases? It is this—that where one person has, without leave, been using the land of another for his own purposes he must pay for it. The law is now settled by Jegon v. Vivian, 19 W. R. 365, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 742, which was approved of in Livingstone v. Rawyards Coal Co., 28 W. R. 357, 5 App. Cas. 25. Those cases proceed on the principle stated by Lord Hatherley in Phillips v. Homfray, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 770, 20 W. R. Dig. 121, where he says: "I at first felt some doubt as to compensation for wayleave"—it had done no pecuniary damage, of course—"but on further consideration I think that, on principle, it ought to be given, whether the cases have as yet gone that length or not. Here is a man doing a surreptitious act, which cannot be discovered except through the medium of a bill. Under the old practice there would have been a bill for the discovery of the thing, and then an action for damages in respect of it would have been brought; but this court has now the power to grant compensation in respect of a continuously accruing damage de die in diem arising from a continuous trespass underground, which can only be stopped by injunction restraining any further conveyance of coal through the respondents' property. These damages cannot be better assessed than by an inquiry what is fit and proper to be paid for wayleave for the coals carried through the property." If we apply that principle to this case, upon what principle of justice can we say that these defendants are to use the plaintiffs' land for years for their own purposes, and to pay nothing for it? And, in addition to that, they have done them an injury. Chitty, J., has proceeded on that principle, and it is right. The principle being right, the figures are agreed, and the appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I am also of opinion that the decision of Chitty, J., is correct. I do not think that we are departing from the established and uniform rule that the plaintiff in an action for trespass is to be paid for the injury which he has sustained from the wrongful act of the defendant, and that any benefit to the defendant is not an element to be taken into consideration. If we apply that rule here, what do we find that the plaintiffs have suffered in consequence of the wrongful act of the defendants? The value of their land has been diminished. We have only to decide the question of principle; we have nothing to do with figures. The value of the land unquestionably has been diminished, and the defendants' counsel admits that the plaintiffs are entitled to be paid for that. But there is something more in respect of which the plaintiffs are, in my opinion, entitled to compensation—that is, the use that the defendants have made of their land for eight years. That is the principle applied by Chitty, J., and I think it is right. This is a peculiar case, and may be said to be a mixed case, something between wayleave and trespass, and there is no authority which can be said to have a strict bearing upon it.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. We have only to deal with the principle upon which the judgment of Chitty, J., was based, and which I consider to be right. Independently of permanent damage done, there has been user of the plaintiffs' land. We cannot take an account of the profits made by the defendants; no one suggests that. In fact, it is a matter of indifference whether the defendants made a profit or a loss. They did use the land for the purpose of carrying over it spoil, which they ultimately deposited on the plaintiffs' land, and it appears to me that is entirely within the principle of Jegon v. Vivian and the other cases of that kind.

There is nothing special in the nature of a wayleave; there is nothing special for this purpose in underground workings. The principle is this—that a trespasser shall not be allowed to make use of another person's land without in some way accounting to that person for so doing. Very often the convenient way is an inquiry "what is fit and proper to be paid for wayleave," but it is only a convenient way. Very often there is in a locality a customary wayleave which gives the measure of damages. But the principle is that in some way or other—if you can do nothing better, then, I suppose, by rule of thumb—you must charge a trespassing defendant for the use of the land. In this case we are relieved from all difficulty as to figures by the agreement of counsel; and all we have to say is that Chitty, J., was right, with the consequence that the damages will be £550, and the appeal must be dismissed.

CAREW v. CAREW. (a.)

Will—Construction—Reversionary interest—"Legal disability" preventing legatee from taking for his own benefit—Bankruptcy, subsequently annulled.

A testator gave the income of his residuary estate to his wife for life, and subject thereto gave a moiety of such estate to his son; but in case the son should at the time of the wife's death be "under any legal disability in consequence whereof he would be hindered in or prevented from taking the same for his own personal and exclusive benefit," then the testator gave the same over to the son's wife and children.

During the widow's lifetime the son, who was one of the executors of the testator, was ordered to pay a sum of £5,188 to the estate, such sum being assets received by the son in the administration of the estate, and his reversionary interest under the will was declared liable to make good such sum. The son had also mortgaged his reversionary interest.

On the day of the death of the tenant for life, but before the death, the son was, on his own application, adjudicated bankrupt; but the order of adjudication was shortly afterwards annulled on the ground that it ought never to have been made.

Held, that the words "legal disability" as used in the will indicated a disability imposed by act of law rather than a disability arising simply from the voluntary act of the legatee, and that therefore, on the above facts, no such legal disability arose as would cause the gift over to take effect; further, the bankruptcy, being a mere device on the part of the son, ought not to be regarded.

Decision of Stirling, J., ante, p. 296, [1896] 1 Ch. 527, affirmed.

Appeal from Stirling, J. (reported ante, p. 296, [1896] 1 Ch. 527).

By his will, dated the 11th of January, 1886, George Carew, a solicitor, gave his wife specific and pecuniary legacies, and the income of his estate to her for her life, and subject thereto one equal moiety to his granddaughter Jessie Carew. "And as to the other equal moiety thereof, and in case of the death (under age) of my said granddaughter, then as to the entirety of my said worldly estate and property I give the same, subject as aforesaid, to my son Henry George Carew; but if he should predecease either my said wife or me, or in case of his being at the time of the death of the survivor of my said wife and me under any legal disability, in consequence whereof he would be hindered in or prevented from taking the same for his own personal and exclusive benefit," then over.

By the chief clerk's certificate made in the action on the 29th of July, 1894, a sum of £5,188 16s. 10d. was found due to the testator's estate from H. G. Carew, and by an order on further consideration on the 30th of January, 1895, H. G. Carew was ordered to pay the said sum to the trustees of the will.

On the 16th of March, 1895, the testator's widow died. On the same day, but before the death of Mrs. Carew, a receiving order and an order of adjudication in bankruptcy were, on his own application, made against H. G. Carew. On the 4th of April such bankruptcy proceedings were annulled, on the ground that the orders ought never to have been made. By mortgage deeds of various dates H. G. Carew alone, and he and his wife jointly, mortgaged their interests under the testator's will to several mortgagees to secure various sums of money, and H. G. Carew by deed assigned all his interest under the will to a trustee upon trust to raise £2,500 for the benefit of his wife and children, and, subject thereto, upon trust for himself.

A summons having been taken out for a declaration as to who, upon the true construction of the will, were entitled to the moiety of the testator's estate bequeathed to H. G. Carew, Stirling, J., held that H. G. Carew was not, at the date of the death of the testator's widow, under any "legal disability" within the meaning of those words as used in the will, and consequently that H. G. Carew, or those claiming under him, were entitled (see the report, ante, p. 296).

The wife and children of H. G. Carew, who would be the persons entitled in the event of the gift over having taken effect, appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 19.—LINDLEY, L.J.—The question raised by this appeal turns on the true construction of a clause in the will of a solicitor. [His lordship referred to the will, to the bankruptcy of the son, and to the order declaring the sum found due from him to be a charge on his share of his father's property.]

There are two ways of construing the clause in the will relating to the son's share. One is that on the death of his mother the son is to be entitled to one-half of the residuary estate, unless he is at that time under some legal disability which prevents him from taking and enjoying such half for his own personal and exclusive benefit. The other is that on the death of his mother the son is to be entitled to one-half of the residuary estate unless something has occurred which legally prevents him from taking and enjoying such half for his own personal and exclusive benefit.

There is no context to show more precisely than the clause itself shows what the testator really meant. The first of the above constructions is the more liberal of the two; but it is open to the objection that the meaning of being "under a legal disability" is not free from ambiguity. Such words have no precise technical meaning; but the explanations given of "ability" in Comyns' Digest and "disability" in Jacobs & Tomline's Law Dictionaries lead me to infer that legal disability would include bankruptcy, conviction for felony, attainder for treason, and lunacy. Infancy need not be considered, as the son was over twenty-one when the will was made. An alienation would not create a legal disability; still less would a mortgage or charge. In this case the son had procured himself to be made bankrupt, but the bankruptcy was annulled as being a mere device and trick, and it ought to be disregarded accordingly. The son was at his mother's death sui juris in all respects, he was under no legal disability of any kind; and if the first construction is the right one, he became entitled to one-half the property, subject to the payment of the amounts charged upon it.

The second of the above constructions is open to the objection that it departs more than the first from the words of the clause; and further, that this construction leads to results which it is difficult to suppose the testator really intended. The clause is not so worded as to amount to a gift to the son until alienation, and then to his wife and children; and it can hardly be supposed that the testator meant that his son was not to have anything if he alienated or charged his half before his mother's death, but was to be at liberty to alienate or charge it as soon as she was dead. The words do not warrant the inference that a mere incumbrance by the son, existing at his mother's death, was to deprive him of all benefit under the will. Inability to pay off a debt charged upon property may prevent the owner from ever actually personally enjoying the property; but such inability can hardly be described as a "legal disability" from enjoying it. On these grounds I am of opinion that the first construction is the sounder of the two. The appeal therefore must be dismissed with costs.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the limitations in this will are alternative limitations, and the important words are "under any legal disability in consequence whereof he would be hindered in or prevented from taking the same for his own personal exclusive benefit." The governing words there are, in my judgment, "legal disability." What did the testator mean by legal disability? I think he meant a disability by act of law, and not a disability created by Carew himself; a personal disability imposed on him by the law, not voluntarily created, but imposed in invitum, such for instance as bankruptcy, or conviction for felony, or attainder for treason, and in my judgment also lunacy. I cannot think, having regard to the words used in the will, that the testator ever intended that those words should include a mortgage or a charge, or that he ever thought of those being such a disability as he was dealing with. If that were the legal conclusion, any small charge made a week before the mother's death would bring the case within the words—a small charge which he could pay off a fortnight afterwards. I cannot think the testator ever intended a disability arising from mere impecuniosity, to take effect. I therefore am of opinion that the learned judge in the court below was perfectly right in the view he took of the true construction of this will, and that the appeal must be dismissed.

KAY, L.J.—This appeal raises a question of construction of the will of George Carew, who was a solicitor. [His lordship stated the clause in the will, and continued:—] The son Henry G. Carew mortgaged his interest under the will. He, as executor of the testator, received assets of the testator to the amount of £5,188, and that sum is still due from him. When the testator's widow was at the point of death he, for the purpose of causing the alternative gift in favour of his own wife and children to take effect, procured himself to be adjudicated bankrupt on his own petition. On the 16th of March, 1895, the testator's widow died. The bankruptcy was annulled on the 4th of April on the ground of its being a device. On the 30th of January, 1895, an order was made on the further consideration of a suit for administration of the estate by which Henry was ordered to pay the £5,188, and it was declared that any interest coming to him under the will was liable to make it good, and that sum and the costs of the action which he was ordered to pay were declared a charge upon his interest, if any.

The question is whether, under these circumstances, the alternative gift to the wife and children of Henry has taken effect. This limitation is not in any of the forms which use has rendered familiar. It does not contain any words referring to voluntary alienation. I am clearly of opinion that neither the mortgages made by Henry nor his pretended bankruptcy, although existing at the death of the widow, which is the point of time referred to in the alternative limitation, caused the gift in favour of Henry's wife and children to take effect.

The difficulty is to determine what was the consequence of his liability to pay to the trustees £5,188 and the order making this sum a charge upon his interest, if any. It was argued that this did create a legal disability in consequence whereof he was hindered in taking his share for his own personal and exclusive benefit. But does this create a legal disability? Legal disability must be a disability of the person referred to occasioned by act of law.

It was ingeniously argued that even without this order of the court there is a rule of law which prevented Henry from taking anything under the will until his liability to the estate as a trustee or executor was satisfied. That is quite true, but is that the legal disability contemplated by this clause? At any rate, it is urged that if that would not do, the order of the court which was made during the life of the tenant for life, and remained unsatisfied at her death, created a disability by act of law.

I confess I think this question of the effect of Henry's indebtedness and of the order one of some difficulty. I agree that in order to arrive at a true solution of it the general intention and scheme of the will must be considered. The best mode of putting the case for the appellant seems to me to be to treat disability as meaning disability of Henry to take for his own personal and exclusive benefit. If such disability is occasioned by act of law, the alternative gift takes effect. Any proceeding in a court of law in invitum, although brought about by Henry's own act or default, is a legal disability within the meaning of this provision.

But that would be reading the clause as though it were written, "If Henry is prevented from taking for his own benefit by the judgment or order of any court, the property shall go to his wife and children." The object of the testator does not seem to have been to prevent Henry from alienating or charging his interest. If a charge created by the act of the legatee was not to make the alternative limitation take effect, it is difficult to suppose that the testator intended that a charge imposed by a rule of law or by an order of the court was to have that consequence. Moreover, if that was so, a judgment for a small amount, £10 or £5, and execution unsatisfied at the time specified, would cause the property to go over. If that were the clear meaning of the words,

Cur. adv. vult.

May 19.—LINDLEY, L.J.—The question raised by this appeal turns on the true construction of a clause in the will of a solicitor. [His lordship referred to the will, to the bankruptcy of the son, and to the order declaring the sum found due from him to be a charge on his share of his father's property.]

There are two ways of construing the clause in the will relating to the son's share. One is that on the death of his mother the son is to be entitled to one-half of the residuary estate, unless he is at that time under some legal disability which prevents him from taking and enjoying such half for his own personal and exclusive benefit. The other is that on the death of his mother the son is to be entitled to one-half of the residuary estate unless something has occurred which legally prevents him from taking and enjoying such half for his own personal and exclusive benefit.

There is no context to show more precisely than the clause itself shows what the testator really meant. The first of the above constructions is the more liberal of the two; but it is open to the objection that the meaning of being "under a legal disability" is not free from ambiguity. Such words have no precise technical meaning; but the explanations given of "ability" in Comyns' Digest and "disability" in Jacobs & Tomline's Law Dictionaries lead me to infer that legal disability would include bankruptcy, conviction for felony, attainder for treason, and lunacy. Infancy need not be considered, as the son was over twenty-one when the will was made. An alienation would not create a legal disability; still less would a mortgage or charge. In this case the son had procured himself to be made bankrupt, but the bankruptcy was annulled as being a mere device and trick, and it ought to be disregarded accordingly. The son was at his mother's death sui juris in all respects, he was under no legal disability of any kind; and if the first construction is the right one, he became entitled to one-half the property, subject to the payment of the amounts charged upon it.

The second of the above constructions is open to the objection that it departs more than the first from the words of the clause; and further, that this construction leads to results which it is difficult to suppose the testator really intended. The clause is not so worded as to amount to a gift to the son until alienation, and then to his wife and children; and it can hardly be supposed that the testator meant that his son was not to have anything if he alienated or charged his half before his mother's death, but was to be at liberty to alienate or charge it as soon as she was dead. The words do not warrant the inference that a mere incumbrance by the son, existing at his mother's death, was to deprive him of all benefit under the will. Inability to pay off a debt charged upon property may prevent the owner from ever actually personally enjoying the property; but such inability can hardly be described as a "legal disability" from enjoying it. On these grounds I am of opinion that the first construction is the sounder of the two. The appeal therefore must be dismissed with costs.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the limitations in this will are alternative limitations, and the important words are "under any legal disability in consequence whereof he would be hindered in or prevented from taking the same for his own personal exclusive benefit." The governing words there are, in my judgment, "legal disability." What did the testator mean by legal disability? I think he meant a disability by act of law, and not a disability created by Carew himself; a personal disability imposed on him by the law, not voluntarily created, but imposed in invitum, such for instance as bankruptcy, or conviction for felony, or attainder for treason, and in my judgment also lunacy. I cannot think, having regard to the words used in the will, that the testator ever intended that those words should include a mortgage or a charge, or that he ever thought of those being such a disability as he was dealing with. If that were the legal conclusion, any small charge made a week before the mother's death would bring the case within the words—a small charge which he could pay off a fortnight afterwards. I cannot think the testator ever intended a disability arising from mere impecuniosity, to take effect. I therefore am of opinion that the learned judge in the court below was perfectly right in the view he took of the true construction of this will, and that the appeal must be dismissed.

KAY, L.J.—This appeal raises a question of construction of the will of George Carew, who was a solicitor. [His lordship stated the clause in the will, and continued:—] The son Henry G. Carew mortgaged his interest under the will. He, as executor of the testator, received assets of the testator to the amount of £5,188, and that sum is still due from him. When the testator's widow was at the point of death he, for the purpose of causing the alternative gift in favour of his own wife and children to take effect, procured himself to be adjudicated bankrupt on his own petition. On the 16th of March, 1895, the testator's widow died. The bankruptcy was annulled on the 4th of April on the ground of its being a device. On the 30th of January, 1895, an order was made on the further consideration of a suit for administration of the estate by which Henry was ordered to pay the £5,188, and it was declared that any interest coming to him under the will was liable to make it good, and that sum and the costs of the action which he was ordered to pay were declared a charge upon his interest, if any.

The question is whether, under these circumstances, the alternative gift to the wife and children of Henry has taken effect. This limitation is not in any of the forms which use has rendered familiar. It does not contain any words referring to voluntary alienation. I am clearly of opinion that neither the mortgages made by Henry nor his pretended bankruptcy, although existing at the death of the widow, which is the point of time referred to in the alternative limitation, caused the gift in favour of Henry's wife and children to take effect.

The difficulty is to determine what was the consequence of his liability to pay to the trustees £5,188 and the order making this sum a charge upon his interest, if any. It was argued that this did create a legal disability in consequence whereof he was hindered in taking his share for his own personal and exclusive benefit. But does this create a legal disability? Legal disability must be a disability of the person referred to occasioned by act of law.

It was ingeniously argued that even without this order of the court there is a rule of law which prevented Henry from taking anything under the will until his liability to the estate as a trustee or executor was satisfied. That is quite true, but is that the legal disability contemplated by this clause? At any rate, it is urged that if that would not do, the order of the court which was made during the life of the tenant for life, and remained unsatisfied at her death, created a disability by act of law.

I confess I think this question of the effect of Henry's indebtedness and of the order one of some difficulty. I agree that in order to arrive at a true solution of it the general intention and scheme of the will must be considered. The best mode of putting the case for the appellant seems to me to be to treat disability as meaning disability of Henry to take for his own personal and exclusive benefit. If such disability is occasioned by act of law, the alternative gift takes effect. Any proceeding in a court of law in invitum, although brought about by Henry's own act or default, is a legal disability within the meaning of this provision.

But that would be reading the clause as though it were written, "If Henry is prevented from taking for his own benefit by the judgment or order of any court, the property shall go to his wife and children." The object of the testator does not seem to have been to prevent Henry from alienating or charging his interest. If a charge created by the act of the legatee was not to make the alternative limitation take effect, it is difficult to suppose that the testator intended that a charge imposed by a rule of law or by an order of the court was to have that consequence. Moreover, if that was so, a judgment for a small amount, £10 or £5, and execution unsatisfied at the time specified, would cause the property to go over. If that were the clear meaning of the words, of course the court must enforce it; but if it is doubtful, these considerations are important.

Then, further, in a case where the meaning is dubious the consequence of either construction may and ought to be considered. If this property has gone over to Henry's wife and children, not only are all the charges made by him upon it defeated, but Jessie will lose half of the £5,188, which is her share of Henry's debt to the estate, and he will have had all that money, besides what he has raised upon his share by mortgages, which I understand he cannot redeem. If the limitation in favour of Henry's wife and children has not taken effect, Jessie will recover her full share of the estate, and there will be something for the mortgagees of Henry. His wife and other children will get nothing. The latter of these two constructions will occasion less injustice than the other.

On the whole I think the words "legal disability" mean a bankruptcy, or possibly a felony, some condition of the legatee in consequence of which the law deprives him of his property; not a mere charge created by judgment and execution, or imposed by decree of a court. Either of these he might get rid of by paying the amount, and in this respect a charge imposed by the judgment of a court is no more a disability than a charge created by his own voluntary act. For these reasons I think that this appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

ROBINSON v. HARKIN. (a.)

Trustee—Employment of outside broker—Negligence—Contribution—Statute of Limitations—Trustee Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 59), s. 8, sub-section 1 (a) (b).

The employment by a trustee of an outside broker is not in itself a departure from his duty as a trustee. The right to contribution between co-trustees is governed by the same principles as regulate the right to contribution between co-sureties. The principle laid down as regards co-sureties in Wolmershausen v. Gullick, [1893] 2 Ch. 514, 41 W. R. Dig. 193, accordingly applies to the case of a trustee suing a co-trustee for contribution in respect of a liability incurred from loss occasioned to the trust estate by their joint default; and the Statute of Limitations does not begin to run as between the co-trustees until the claim of the cestui que trust is established against the trustee claiming contribution.

This was a summons by one trustee of a settlement made in 1884 on the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Keegan, and by the three infant children of the marriage, against the other trustee of the settlement, seeking to make him liable for a loss of about £1,000 caused by his negligence.

The defendant denied the negligence, and claimed contribution from the plaintiff trustee.

The loss was incurred as follows.

By the settlement £2,500 was covenanted to be settled by Mrs. Keegan's father.

The trustees of the settlement were the plaintiff Robinson, who was at the date of the settlement a medical student, aged 23, and is now a medical practitioner in the country, and the defendant Harkin, who is a wine merchant. The latter had commenced business in 1881 along with a fellow clerk, and the evidence showed that in 1884 the business of the firm was very small.

Neither the plaintiff nor the defendant had at the date of the settlement any private banking account; but the defendant's firm had one.

The £2,500 covenanted to be paid was paid in July, 1885, by a cheque to order, which was brought to the plaintiff Robinson, endorsed by him, and then forwarded to the defendant.

On the 14th of January, 1885, the husband Keegan wrote to the defendant that he and his wife wished the money to be invested in North-Eastern Railway Four per Cent. Preference Shares, adding that if the defendant had a stockbroker on his books he should employ him.

The defendant acted on this suggestion, and entrusted the money to a customer of his named Record, who was a stockbroker, though not a member of the Stock Exchange.

The defendant received the following acknowledgment, dated the 14th of July, 1885, for the money from Record: "I beg to acknowledge receipt of cheque for £2,500, the amount, less commission, to be invested in such stocks and in such names as might be hereafter advised."

Record duly invested a portion of the stock.

On the representation of Mr. Keegan, who complained of Record not having invested the whole sum, the defendant saw Record and obtained from him a contract note, purporting to be for the purchase of £400 Great Eastern Four per Cent. Preference Stock and £480 Manchester, Sheffield, & Lincolnshire Four per Cent. Preference Stock. If these purchases had been made the investment of the £2,500 would have been complete; but no delivery of any such stock was ever made, and, in fact, the balance of £1,000 was never invested at all.

Record was insolvent, so that nothing could be gained by an action against him, and in September, 1888, the money was irretrievably lost.

The money that had been invested was invested in the name of the defendant only, but there was no allegation of any bad faith on his part.

The plaintiff Robinson had simply left the whole matter in the hands of the defendant, and had no intimation that there was anything wrong till October, 1888.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and C. E. Bovill, for the plaintiff Robinson and the infant co-plaintiffs.—If a man accepts a trust, he undertakes by such acceptance to exercise ordinary prudence. A trust is implied at law to invest in the names of the trustees, and it is no defence that he invested in his own name. As to the counterclaim, where there has been no fraud or improper conduct, a right to contribution can only be established where it is proved that the act which caused the loss was the act of the person who is sought to be made liable or the joint act of the two. Here the loss was caused by employing Record and putting the money in his hands, which was not a joint act. The only joint act was for the sake of conformity: Lingard v. Bromley, 1 V. & B. 114. The defendant cannot claim contribution under the circumstances.

They also referred to Speight v. Gaunt, 31 W. R. 401, 32 W. R. 435, 22 Ch. D. 727, 9 App. Cas. 1; Lewis v. Nobbs, 26 W. R. 631, 8 Ch. D. 591; Bahin v. Hughes, 34 W. R. 311, 31 Ch. D. 390.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Grosvenor Woods, Q.C., and Curtis Price, for the defendant Harkin.—Mr. Record persuaded the defendant that he was acting in good faith, and the defendant ought not to be charged with wilful default because he trusted in these representations. The defendant has got no benefit from this trust, and if he is liable the plaintiff is equally so.

They referred to the Trustee Act, 1893, s. 24; Speight v. Gaunt, Lewis v. Nobbs, Bahin v. Hughes, and Chillingworth v. Chambers, ante, pp. 32 and 388, [1896] 1 Ch. 685.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., in reply.—The step of employing Record was the cause of the loss, and this was not a joint act of the trustees. As to the defendant's claim for contribution, we have a defence under section 8 of the Trustee Act, 1888, and ask leave to amend in order to plead it.

Curtis Price replied as to the defence under the Trustee Act, 1888.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 17.—STIRLING, J., after stating the facts, said:—The question which I have to decide reduces itself to this: whether the defendant, either alone or jointly with the plaintiff Robinson, is liable for the loss of the trust money. The duty of trustees with reference to the investment of trust moneys was considered in Speight v. Gaunt, 31 W. R. 401, 32 W. R. 435, 22 Ch. D. 727, 9 App. Cas. 1. [His lordship then read extracts from the judgment of Jessel, M.R., in 22 Ch. D., at p. 739, "It seems to me that on general principles . . . it does not appear to me in that case that the trustee can be liable"; and from those of Lord Selborne, 9 App. Cas., at p. 5, "Neither the statute, however, . . . they may properly have recourse"; and Lord Blackburne, at p. 19, "The authorities cited by the late Master of the Rolls, . . . and is a breach of trust," and continued:—] It is by the principles laid down in that case that the liability of the trustees in the present instance is to be determined. First, then, as to the defendant's liability. He entrusted to Record £2,500 on the terms of the letter of the 14th of July, 1885. Was he justified in so doing? What was the position of Record? He was a stockbroker, but not a member of the Stock Exchange. It is a matter of common knowledge that outside brokers do not enjoy so high a reputation as members of the Stock Exchange; still the evidence does not show that there may not be outside brokers who are of good repute in the City of London, and I do not decide the case on that ground alone. The defendant states that he did not at that time know the difference between outside and inside brokers. What he did know of Record was this. He became acquainted with him through his partner, who had known him, he says, for many years. He was also introduced as a customer by Mr. Maynard, an accountant and a mutual friend. Defendant had never previously spoken to him, being, as he was, a customer of his partner; he paid his bills promptly when sent in. The defendant went to his office at Warneford-court, and "formed the idea he was worth about £10,000 from the look of his clerks (four or five), and the business going on."

The defendant's partner was not called. Mr. Maynard was. The latter stated that he introduced the defendant to Mr. Record; he did not tell the defendant that he was an outside broker; the introduction had nothing to do with the Stock Exchange. He declined in the most marked way to express any opinion with regard to Record's financial position in 1885, but said that he had employed him as a broker and he had carried out the business satisfactorily. This is the whole of the evidence on this head, and it seems to me to come to little more than this: that Record appeared to carry on business as an outside broker and was regarded as a good customer by a firm of wine merchants in a small way of business. It certainly does not establish the allegation in the defendant's statement of defence that Record "was a person of good credit in the City of London as a broker." I think that the defendant failed to exercise proper care in the selection of a broker, and further that he departed from the usual course of business in depositing with the person selected so large a sum as £2,500 on the terms of the letter of the 14th of July, 1885. In my judgment he has failed to justify the handing over of this sum to Record, and is liable for the loss thereby occasioned. What was the plaintiff Robinson's position between the 10th of July, 1885, and the 25th of September, 1888? He says: "I left the matter of the trust in the hands of the defendant; I judged him to be a man of experience in business matters." So his first step was to hand over the money to the defendant and make him sole judge of the investment and the broker. I think this was a departure from his duty. The plaintiff in the course of his cross-examination stated that he made inquiries by letter from time to time between July, 1885, and September, 1888. He had kept no copies of these letters or of the defendant's replies. He was aware that no railway stock had been transferred into his name. The only answer to his inquiries that he could remember was that the defendant was seeking favourable opportunities to buy Great Eastern shares. The defendant denies these statements. He says: "If the plaintiff Robinson wrote to me between 1885 and October, 1888, I never received the letters, and certainly did not answer them." The defendant does not allege that he kept the plaintiff informed of what was being done with reference to the investments. Both plaintiff and defendant were perfectly honest witnesses, and the memory of one or the other must be at fault. My opinion is that more probably the plaintiff is mistaken than the defendant. However that may be, it seems plain on his own admission that he was satisfied with the most general answer to his inquiries, and for a period of three years left the whole matter in the hands of his co-trustee. Making every allowance for his youth and inexperience, I cannot hold that in reference to this trust he took the same precautions as an ordinary prudent man of business would have taken with regard to his own affairs, and in my judgment the plaintiff Robinson is as between himself and the infant co-plaintiffs liable in respect of the loss no less than the defendant.

The question then arises whether the defendant is entitled to contribution from the plaintiff. This subject has been considered by the Court of Appeal in the recent case of Chillingworth v. Chambers, ante, pp. 32 and 388, [1896] 1 Ch. 685. In that case Smith, L.J., said: "As between two trustees who are in pari delicto, the one who has made good a loss occasioned by a breach of trust for which two are jointly and severally liable may obtain contribution to that loss from the other." And Lindley, L.J. said: "The plaintiff and the defendant being in pari delicto, the plaintiff's right as trustee to contribution from the defendant as co-trustee is established by a long series of authorities, of which it is only necessary to mention Lingard v. Bromley and Bahin v. Hughes. Both these cases thus referred to, and particularly the latter, show that for the purposes of the rule one trustee is to be treated as in pari delicto with his co-trustee, although he may have taken the more active part in the conduct of the business which led to the loss." [His lordship then read the head-notes to Lingard v. Bromley and Bahin v. Hughes and extracts from the judgments of Cotton, L.J., at page 396 of 31 Ch. D., "Miss Hughes was the active trustee. . . . All the trustees were in the wrong, and every one is equally liable to indemnify the beneficiaries"; and of Fry, L.J., at page 398, "Upon the second part I also agree with my brother Cotton, L.J. . . . Such a doctrine would be against the policy of the court in relation to trusts."] Having regard to the principles there laid down, I come to the conclusion that the plaintiff Robinson has not made out any case for throwing the entire liability on the defendant. That being so, the general right of the defendant to contribution remains.

It was then said in argument that there was a defence under the Statute of Limitations, and in particular under the Trustee Act, 1888, s. 8. This defence is not pleaded as it ought to have been, and I was asked to give leave to amend by pleading it. This application was met by another on the part of the defendant, that he might be at liberty to amend by pleading the same statute as against the plaintiff Robinson; of course, these statutes would be of no avail against the infant co-plaintiffs. Having regard to the late period at which this defence was first suggested, I confess I feel considerable difficulty in acceding to the application for leave to amend, and if I did accede to it I should certainly give the defendant leave to amend also. I have, however, considered the question on its merits, and am of opinion that the Statutes of Limitation afford no defence. It was laid down in Dering v. Winchilsea (Earl), 1 Cox. 318: "Contribution is bottomed and fixed on general principles of justice, and does not spring from contract, though contract may qualify it. . . ." "The reason given in the books is that in æquali jure the law requires equality, one shall not have the burden in ease of the rest; and the law is grounded on great equity. Contract is never mentioned." The law was in that case applied between co-sureties; but the principles laid down apply equally to contribution between co-trustees, and it has been held that such right to contribution gives rise to a debt in some cases in the nature of a specialty, in others of a simple contract: see Lockhart v. Reilly, 1 De G. & J. 464, 6 W. R. Ch. Dig. 90; Priestman v. Tindall, 24 Beav. 244, 6 W. R. Ch. Dig. 92. In the former case one of two trustees was held entitled to the benefit of section 5 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act. The Statutes of Limitation applicable to the recovery of such debts would therefore have been defences to claims in right of contribution prior to 1888, and consequently it seems to me the case is not governed by sub-section 1 (b) of section 8 of the Act of 1888, but by sub-section 1 (a). It was held in Wolmershausen v. Gullick, [1893] 2 Ch. 514, 41 W. R. Dig. 193, that in a case of contribution between two co-sureties time did not begin to run under the Statutes of Limitation until the liability of one of the sureties was established, that is, until the claim of the principal creditor was established against the surety. I think the like principle applies here, and that time does not begin to run as between the plaintiff Robinson and the defendant Harkin until the claim of the infant cestuis que trust was established against the latter, and consequently that time only begins to run as between them from the date of the present judgment.

Judgment accordingly.

ACCUMULATIONS.—See TRUSTEE, 10.

ADMINISTRATION:—

1. Costs—Real and personal estate.—Where the costs of an administration are increased by the administration of real estate, such increased costs must be borne by the real estate.—Copland, Re, Mitchell v. Bain, CH.D. NORTH, J., 94.

2. Insolvent estate—Annuity—Right of retainer—Judicature Act, 1875, s. 10.—An administratrix is not entitled to retain out of the estate when insolvent the estimated value of an annuity covenanted to be paid to her by the deceased. Her only right is to prove with the other creditors. Arrears due at the death can be retained.—Beeman, Re, Fowler v. James, CH.D. NORTH, J., 247.

3. Insolvent estate—Married woman—Loan to husband—Claim against deceased husband's estate—Practice—Judicature Act, 1875, s. 10—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), s. 3.—In an action for the administration of the estate of an insolvent testator the testator's widow claimed as a creditor in respect of a loan made by her to the deceased out of her separate estate during coverture.

Held, that the claim of the widow was not to be postponed to the claims of the other creditors by the joint operation of section 10 of the Judicature Act (England), 1875 (s. 28, sub-section (1) Irish Judicature Act, 1877), and of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 3.—Moore v. Smith, C.A. (Ir).

4. Insolvent estate — Married woman—Right of retainer as administratrix of deceased husband—Practice—Judicature Act, 1875, s. 10—Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 3.—Neither the Judicature Act, 1875, s. 10, nor the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 3, nor both combined, has made any change in the common law right of retainer.

Crawford v. May, 38 W. R. 765, 45 Ch. D. 499, followed.

A personal representative does not waive the right of retainer by claiming a debt due by the deceased to him for the purpose of having its existence and amount certified by the chief clerk; it is on the hearing on further consideration that the right of retainer is usually and properly claimed.—Simpson, Re, V.C. (Ir.).

5. Insolvent estate—Transfer to Bankruptcy Court of Chancery administration action.—The beneficiaries under a will commenced an action in the Chancery Division against the acting trustee and executor, who was a partner in the deceased testator's business, claiming a declaration that the assets of the business formed part of the estate of the testator; that an account might be taken of the partnership dealings, and that the affairs of the partnership might be wound up; that the defendant might be removed from being a trustee, and that new trustees might be appointed; and administration of the testator's estate. A receiver was then appointed to get in the testator's estate and the debts and assets of the partnership business. Shortly afterwards the defendant was adjudicated a bankrupt. Thereupon his trustee in bankruptcy applied to the Chancery Division that the receiver might be discharged and the action handed over to the Bankruptcy Court so far as related to the debts and assets of the partnership business. It was decided by Kekewich, J., that the Chancery Division having seisin of the action it would not be proper to hand it over to the Bankruptcy Court, nor to divide the administration into two parts. On appeal:

Held, that the application was wrongly made, the right procedure being to apply to the judge of the Bankruptcy Court under section 102, subsection 4, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, to order a transfer to himself of the action pending in the Chancery Division.

Held, therefore, that on this ground the appeal must be dismissed.—Somes, Re, Stewart v. Somes, C.A.

6. Insolvency in India—11 & 12 Vict. c. 21, s. 7—Fund in court—Payment out.—Administration need not be taken out in England to the estate of an insolvent who died intestate in India. Administration having been taken out in India to such intestate's estate, the official assignee of the Insolvent Court of Bombay, in whom the property of the insolvent had vested under the insolvency, held entitled to payment out of a fund in court in England standing to the credit of the deceased.

In re Davidson's Settlement Trusts, 21 W. R. 452, L. R. 15 Eq. 383, followed.—Lawson's Trusts, Re, CH.D. NORTH, J., 280.

7. Intestacy—Will subsequently found—Grant of administration revoked—Will proved—Infant next of kin shares paid into court under the Trustee Relief Act—Petition by executors for payment out.—A sum of money paid into court under the Trustee Relief Act by the administrator of a supposed intestate, to meet shares of infants under the intestacy, was ordered to be paid out to the executor of a subsequently found will, after revocation of the grant of administration.—Hood's Trusts, Re, CH.D. NORTH, J., 382.

8. Leasehold—Specific devise of—Covenant to keep in repair—Breach of covenant by testator in lifetime—Cost of repairs—Liability as between specific legatee and testator's residuary estate.—As between a tenant for life of a leasehold specifically bequeathed and the general assets of the testator, there is no equity in favour of the latter to throw on the former the costs of putting the leasehold premises, which were dilapidated at the time of testator's death, into repair.—Brereton v. Day, M.R. (Ir.)

9. Retainer — Debt under covenant — Surety — Specialty and simple contract creditors.—By an indenture of mortgage A., the mortgagor, covenanted with B., a surety, to duly pay all moneys secured by the mortgage, and to keep indemnified property mortgaged by B. against all such moneys, and in case B. should pay any money for redemption forthwith to repay such money with interest. A. died, and B. was appointed A.'s administratrix. The day named in the mortgage for repayment of the principal was past, but no part thereof was paid. On an application by specialty creditors of A. under an indenture of lease for payment of their debt,

Held, on the authority of Lethbridge v. Mytton, 2 B. & Ad. 772, and Loosemore v. Radford, 9 M. & W. 657, that if B. had not been administratrix B. could have sued on the first branch of the above covenant for the whole of the moneys secured by the mortgage and recovered the same as damages at law, and therefore that B. was entitled to retain to that extent as against the applicants.

Ferguson v. Gibson, L. R. 14 Eq. 379, 21 W. R. Dig. 6, distinguished.—Allen, Re, Adcock v. Evans, CH.D. CHITTY, J., 644.

10. Statute-barred debt—Fund in court—Creditor administrator of debtor—Right of retainer—Payment out.—By an order made in the presence of A. as legal personal representative of B., a fund of B. in court was carried to the credit of the separate account of B.'s personal representative, and inquiries were directed as to the persons entitled to the fund. A. was also in the position of a statute-barred creditor of B. While the inquiries directed by the order were pending A. applied to have the fund paid out to him as the legal personal representative of B., in order that he might be in a position to retain thereout the statute-barred debt. B. had other creditors whose debts were not statute-barred. The fund did not exceed the amount of the statute-barred debt.

Held, upon these facts, that the court would not order payment out of the fund to A.—Trevor v. Hutchins, APP. 417.

ADMIRALTY:—

1. Co-ownership action—Claim against managing owners — Partnership—Reopening accounts—Statute of Limitations.—The relations between co-owners of a vessel engaged in foreign voyages and her managing owners are, in the absence of any evidence to show that each voyage is a separate trading transaction, to be treated, in relation to the profit and loss on her voyages, as a continuous partnership or agency, as the case may be. Consequently the rule as to partnership accounts applies, the accounts may be gone into without any limit as to time, and the Statute of Limitations does not apply so long as the partnership or agency is continuous.—Pongola, The, P.D. & AD.D.

2. County court—Jurisdiction—Subjects or objects of salvage—Ship—Gas float—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), ss. 2, 458, 476—County

Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), s. 3.—The subjects or objects in respect of the saving of which the High Court of Admiralty has jurisdiction by the common law are confined to a ship, her apparel, her cargo, including flotsam, jetsam, and lagan, or the wreck of them, and to freight in danger and saved by reason of the saving of the ship or cargo; and the subjects or objects of salvage are not enlarged by the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, or by any of the preceding statutes, or by the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868, with the sole exception that the saving of lives of persons in danger from being on board ship have been added to the list of such subjects or objects.

The plaintiffs claimed a salvage award in a county court having Admiralty jurisdiction for services rendered to a gas float adrift in the tidal waters of the Upper Humber. The structure was of iron, boat shaped, and contained gas, which supplied the light raised above it.

Held, that the gas float was not a "ship" or a "wreck" within the meaning of sections 2 and 458 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, and could not be the subject of salvage.—Gas Float Whitton, The, C.A., 263.

3. Practice — Parties — Action in rem—Addition of defendant to claim in personam—Convenience.—Where an action in rem has been commenced against a ship and her owners for damage by collision, and the plaintiffs apply for an order to join the pilot as a defendant to the action, the judge ought to exercise his discretion by refusing to make such order on the ground of inconvenience.—Germanic, The, C.A., 394.

4. Practice—Parties—Joinder of plaintiffs—Salvage—Causes of action—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 16, r. 1.—Separate salvors are entitled, under the practice of the Admiralty Court, to join their claims in one action, and this right is not affected by the decision of the House of Lords in Smurthwaite v. Hannay, 71 L. T. 157, 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 485, [1894] A. C. 494.—Maréchal Suchet, The, P.D. & AD.D.

5. Practice—Parties—Joinder of defendants—Shipowner—Freight—Declaration of lien—Action against consignees — Joinder of shippers — Counter-claim — R. S. C., ord. 16, r. 11—Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), ss. 493-496.—The owners of a cargo of timber shipped it under a bill of lading for consignment to agents for sale. The shipowner warehoused the cargo with a dock company under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, with a notice that it was to remain subject to a lien for freight. The consignees deposited the amount of freight claimed with the dock company, with a notice to retain it. The shipowner brought an action against the consignees claiming a declaration that he was entitled to a lien on the sum so deposited and an order that it should be paid to him. The shipowners were desirous of making a claim against the shipowner for damage to the cargo and for short delivery. The defendants (the consignees) and the shippers joined in an application that the shippers might be added as defendants under ord. 16, r. 11.

Held, that the shippers might be added as defendants.—Montgomery v. Foy, C.A.

6. Practice — Parties — Third-party procedure — Action by shipowners against charterers—Contract of charterers with purchasers of cargo—Indemnity express or implied—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 16, r. 48.—By the terms of a charter-party entered into between the plaintiffs (the shipowners) and the defendants (the charterers) it was provided that the ship should be discharged at port of delivery as customary. The defendants subsequently sold to D. & Co. certain bones to be shipped in one or two vessels, at sellers' option, from the River Plate to Birkenhead as per charter-party; and by the contract it was agreed that the bones were to be weighed in the usual manner, and taken with all faults and defects by D. & Co. from over the ship's side as fast as the captain could deliver, failing which to be resold at the defendants' discretion, D. & Co. being liable for any loss, demurrage, or expenses arising therefrom.

The plaintiffs' ship arrived at the port of delivery with the bones on board, and D. & Co. took delivery thereof in fulfilment of their contract with the defendants.

The plaintiffs having brought an action against the defendants for not having discharged the ship pursuant to the terms of the charter-party, the defendants sought to bring in D. & Co. as third parties under ord. 16, r. 48.

Held, that the contract of D. & Co. with the defendants was not a contract of indemnity either express or implied; and therefore that, on the authority of Speller v. Bristol Steam Navigation Co., 32 W. R. 670, 13 Q. B. D. 96, the defendants were not entitled to bring in D. & Co. as third parties.—Constantine v. Warden, C.A., 162.

7. Practice—Restraint—Sale of ship against the consent of part owners having a majority in interest—Admiralty Court Act, 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), s. 8.—Where the owners of twenty sixty-fourth shares in a ship, having instituted an action of restraint against the ship, applied to the court for a sale of the ship under the 8th section of the Admiralty Court Act, 1861, and it appeared that thirty-eight sixty-fourth shares of the ship had, against the wishes of the applicants, been transferred to a limited liability company which opposed the sale, and that it was impossible that the ship could be profitably employed in the general interest of all the co-owners unless the whole ship belonged to the company, the court decreed a sale of the ship, but ordered the decree to lie in the registry for four days to give the company the opportunity of purchasing the share of the applicants.—Hereward, The, P.D. & AD.D. 288.

ADULTERATION:—

1. Food—False warranty — Summons—Justices—Time for serving summons—Purchase for test purposes —Food and Drugs Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 30), s. 10.—That part of section 10 of the Food and Drugs Act, 1879, which provides that in the case of the sale of a perishable article the summons shall be served within twenty-eight days of the purchase for test purposes does not apply where the purchase for test purposes was not made from the person charged with the offence.—Cook v. White, Q.B.D. 409

2. Margarine — Exposure for sale — Restaurant keepers—Sale of margarine by retail—Margarine Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 29), ss. 4, 6.—The defendants were restaurant keepers, and supplied their customers with (inter alia) "slices" of bread and broiled haddocks, to be consumed on the premises. In the shop was a lump of margarine which was only used to spread upon the slices of bread, and small portions of it were also placed as a condiment upon the broiled haddocks. In both cases the price charged for the slices of bread and for the haddocks was the same whether a portion of the margarine was supplied with them or not. The lump of margarine had no label upon it.

Upon an information laid by one of the customers the magistrate refused to convict the defendants of exposing for sale margarine not labelled as required by the 6th section of the Margarine Act, 1887.

Held, on appeal, that the magistrate was right, as there was evidence to show that the defendants did not sell margarine except in conjunction with some other article, and therefore that there was no "exposing for sale" by retail within the meaning of the section.—Moore v. Pearce's Dining Rooms Co., Q.B.D., 94.

3. Margarine—"Le Dansk"—False trade description—Place of manufacture—Merchandise Marks Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 28), s. 2, sub-section 2; s. 3, sub-section 1 (e) (d).—At a factory in Paris margarine was manufactured, which was sent to a branch factory at Southampton. There the margarine went through a process in which 10 per cent. of Danish butter and milk were added. This compound was then sent to London, to a shop on the outside of which appeared the words "French Factory. Le Dansk," and was retailed to customers under the name of "Le Dansk."

Held, that the substance was of English manufacture, and that the selling of the compound in cardboard boxes on which the words "French Factory. Le Dansk" were printed was a false trade description calculated to deceive the public as to the place or country where the substance was manufactured.—Bischop v. Toler, Q.B.D. 189.

4. Margarine — Penalty — Justices — Police— To whom penalty payable—Municipal Corporations Act, 1835 (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76), s. 126—Metropolitan Police Courts Act, 1839 (2 & 3 Vict. c. 71), ss. 7, 47—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), ss. 12, 28—Margarine Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 29), ss. 11, 12.—A penalty recovered before a metropolitan police magistrate under section 6 of the Margarine Act, 1887, in the case of a prosecution by an "officer, inspector, or constable of the authority who shall have appointed an analyst" within the meaning of section 26 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, must be paid to such officer, inspector, or constable, and not to the receiver of the metropolitan police district, in accordance with section 47 of the Metropolitan Police Courts Act, 1839.

The appropriation of penalties effected by section 26 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, is a "proceeding" within the meaning of section 12 of the Margarine Act, 1887.

5. Margarine—Sale contrary to section 6—Article not purchased for test purposes—Delivery to purchaser in borough—Jurisdiction of county justices—Time for service of summons—Margarine Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 29), ss. 6, 17, 12—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), ss. 6, 12, 14, 20, 21, 28—Sale of Food and Drugs Act Amendment Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 30), s. 10—Poor Law Amendment Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 106), s. 27—Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 45 Vict. c. 50), s. 154.—B. contracted to supply the Guardians of the Poor of the Louth Union with "good fresh butter," and on the 10th of December, 1894, delivered, under such contract, butter at the union workhouse. On the following day it was examined by the committee, and, in the absence of the defendant, one pound of it was divided into three parts, of which one part was sent to an analyst, one part was kept by the Guardians, and one part was taken to B.'s shop, and left there with a letter notifying what had been done. Both B. and the purchasers resided within the borough of Louth, which is one of the parishes in the Louth Union, and does not possess a separate court of quarter sessions.

The analyst to whom one part of the butter was sent certified that it contained 25 per cent. of margarine. An information was preferred against B. for selling margarine otherwise than as prescribed by section 6 of the Margarine Act, 1887. The case was heard and determined by the county justices, who convicted B.

Held, that as the article in question was not purchased "with the intention of submitting the same to analysis," but was sold and delivered for consumption under a contract, compliance with section 14 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, was not necessary as a condition precedent to the prosecution under the Margarine Act, 1887.

Held also, that the county justices had jurisdiction to hear and determine the case under 30 & 31 Vict. c. 106, s. 27, and 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 111 (now in substance section 154 of 45 & 46 Vict. c. 50); and that section 20 of the Food and Drugs Act, 1875, merely says that the person "may" take proceedings "in the place where the article or drug sold was actually delivered to the purchaser."

Held further, that as the justices had found as a fact that margarine is not a perishable article, and that it was not purchased for test purposes, it was not necessary that the summons should have been served under section 10 of the Food and Drugs Act, 1879, within twenty-eight days from the time of the purchase.

Parsons v. Birmingham Dairy Co., 30 W. R. 748, 9 Q. B. D. 172, dissented from.

6. Milk—Abstraction of cream—Disclosure—Notice—Criminal intent—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), ss. 9, 25.—The appellants were charged under section 9 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, with having unlawfully sold milk from which the fat had been abstracted to the extent of 17 per cent. without disclosing such alteration. They were supplied with milk in a can under a contract which contained a warranty as to the purity of the milk. Part of this milk was poured into a churn, and in so doing a large proportion of the cream remained in the can. The prosecutor was served with a glass of milk from this churn, and on being submitted to analysis it was proved to be deficient in cream to the amount of 17 per cent. On the glass in which the milk was served it was stated that it was "not guaranteed as new or pure milk or with all its cream, see notice." The notice was to the effect that the milk was purchased by the appellants under a warranty, but that they were unable to guarantee it as with all its cream, and did not sell it as such.

Held, that the appellants had done all that was reasonable; that they had made a sufficient disclosure within the meaning of section 9, and had substantially complied with the statute. It is not necessary to establish a mens rea for the purpose of the offence under the section, and if the article is in fact altered and is sold without a disclosure, an offence under the section is committed.—Spiers & Pond v. Bennett, Q.B.D., 510.

7. Milk—Added water—Certificate of analyst—

Bare statement of result of analysis—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), ss. 6, 18, 21—Sale of Food and Drugs Amendment Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 30), s. 3.—In a prosecution under the Food and Drugs Act, 1875, for the adulteration of milk, the analyst certified that the sample "contained 5 per cent. of added water."

Held, that such certificate was insufficient evidence of adulteration, because, water being one of the natural constituents of milk, the certificate should have stated what standard of percentage of water in milk was adopted by the analyst in arriving at the excess of 5 per cent. which he stated was added.—Fortune v. Hanson, Q.B.D., 431.

8. Milk—Evidence—Analyst's certificate—Evidence of the defendant—Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63, s. 21.—In proceedings under the Food and Drugs Act, 1875, the certificate of the analyst is not conclusive evidence of the facts therein stated, even when the defendant has not required the analyst to be called as a witness.—Hewitt v. Taylor, Q.B.D., 431.

Tenant for life—Trust for distribution after death of tenant for life—Sale by order of the court—Apportionment Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 35), ss. 2, 3, 4, 5.—Where stock is sold by trustees after the death of a tenant for life the Apportionment Act, 1870, will apply as to any dividend actually received by the trustees. But if the stock be sold cum dividend, so that no dividend actually comes to the hands of the trustees, the Apportionment Act, 1870, will not apply directly.

As a general rule the court will not order apportionment in respect of the increase of price caused by the prospect of a dividend, for the reasons laid down in Scholefield v. Redfern, 11 W. R. 453, 2 Dr. & Sm. 173, and Freeman v. Whitbread, 14 W. R. 188, L. R. 1 Eq. 266.

In special cases, however, apportionment will be directed. So where the court was of opinion that on the construction of the will the trust for distribution ought to have been performed by handing over the trust investments in specie on the death of the tenant for life, apportionment was directed in respect of the enhanced price of certain stock which had been sold cum dividend under order of the court.

ARBITRATION:—

1. Award—Reference to three arbitrators—Award signed by two only—Validity of award.—Where a matter in dispute is referred to the decision of three arbitrators, all three must concur in the making of the award; an award made by two of them only is bad.

An agreement to refer disputes to arbitration provided for a reference to "the decision of one or of three disinterested arbitrators as mutually agreed," and that if three arbitrators were appointed one should be nominated by each of the parties, and the third by the two so nominated. Three arbitrators having been duly nominated and having entered upon the reference, two of them made an award from which the third dissented.

Held, that the award was invalid.—United Kingdom Steamship Association v. Houston, Q.B.D.

2. Award—Setting aside award—Umpire—Misconduct—Bias.—After the appointment of an umpire in an arbitration to determine the value of land compulsorily taken under the Lands Clauses Act, and before the reference, the umpire was retained to act as witness in another claim for one of the parties to the reference; and after the reference, but before the umpire had made his award, he gave evidence for such party as to the value of other land at some distance off taken for the same purposes and under the same Parliamentary powers.

Held, that the fact of the umpire appearing and giving evidence in another case for one of the parties, under the circumstances, did not entitle the other party to the reference to have the award set aside on the ground of misconduct or bias on the part of the umpire.—Haigh and London and North-Western Railway Co.'s Arbitration, Re, Q.B.D., 618.

3. Stay of proceedings—"Step in proceedings"—Arbitration Act, 1889, s. 4—Practice—Appeal—Judicature Act, 1894, s. 1—A defendant by taking out a summons for obtaining an order for an extension of time for delivery of defence takes a "step in the proceedings" within the meaning of section 4 of the Arbitration Act, 1889.

Banker and customer—Forged cheques—Liability of bank—44 Vict. No. 10—Rules and Orders, Order 36, No. 10.—Order 36, No. 10, of the rules under 44 Vict. No. 10, does not empower the court to give judgment in disregard of findings of the jury not objected to, merely because it sets aside one or more findings which have been objected to.

Where the effect of the former was that certain entries debited by the bank to their customer were in respect of cheques forged by one of its servants, that the customer was first informed thereof by the accredited agent of the bank who requested his silence, and that the customer in complying with that request acted honestly and with a view to what he believed to be the bank's interest,

Held, that the silence of the customer was not a legal wrong to the bank, and that he was not estopped from relying on the forgery.

Held, that the infant's equitable estate was not an estate to him and his heirs, and that there being no "special occupant" the infant's estate upon his death passed to his administratrix under section 6 of the Wills Act (1 Vict. c. 26).

The decision of the Court of Appeal in Ireland ([1895] 1 I. R. 44) affirmed.—Mountcashell (Earl) v. More Smyth, H.L.

BANKER:—

1. Evidence—Bankers' Books Evidence Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 11), s. 7.—The court will refuse an application, made under the Bankers' Books Evidence Act, 1879, for leave to inspect before trial bankers' books containing entries of the banking account of a party to the action, if that party swears in an affidavit that there is no item therein relevant to the matters in question, unless the applicant can show from some other document in the cause that such affidavit is inaccurate.

Semble, that the court has jurisdiction under that Act to give leave to inspect the banking account of a person not a party to the action, if items in it would be evidence at the trial against a party to the action; but the court will act in such an application with great caution, and will require evidence from the applicant that items of that nature are to be found in the banking account in question.

Per Kay, L.J.—An application for leave to inspect the banking account of a person not a party to the action should not be granted without his being heard in opposition.—South Staffordshire Tramways Co. v. Ebbsmith, C.A., 97.

BANKRUPTCY:—

1. Act of bankruptcy—Arbitration—Award on submission—Order of court to enforce award—Seizure of goods under fi. fa.—"Process in a civil proceeding" in High Court—Arbitration Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), s. 12—Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 71), s. 1.—Upon an application by originating summons under order 54, an order under section 12 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, was obtained to enforce an award in the same manner as a judgment or order to the same effect; and the goods of the debtor were seized and sold by the sheriff under a writ of fieri facias.

Held, that the summons was a "civil proceeding" in the High Court, and that the issue of the writ of fi. fa. was a "process in a civil proceeding," and that as the debtor's goods had been seized and sold thereunder by the sheriff, the debtor had committed an act of bankruptcy under section 1 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890.—Birch, Re, Caucasian Trading Corporation, Ex parte, C.A., 439.

2. Act of bankruptcy—Bankruptcy notice—Interpleader—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (c. 52), s. 4 (1) (g).—Where goods taken in execution under a judgment have been claimed by a third party before the sheriff has made a return, and an interpleader summons has been taken out and is pending, the judgment creditor cannot issue execution for the amount of the judgment debt, and therefore cannot serve a bankruptcy notice on the judgment debtor.—Follows, Re, Follows, Ex parte, BKCY.

3. Act of bankruptcy—Non-trader—Letter to a creditor—Notice of intention to suspend payment—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (c. 52), s. 4, sub-section 1 (h).—Judgment creditors of H., who was in money difficulties, were pressing for payment. He offered them a second mortgage on certain estates, which would give them ample security. They declined, being under the impression that they could obtain payment by levying execution; and on the 4th of June, 1894, H.'s solicitors wrote the judgment creditors—"as promised we send you herewith statement showing income and expenditure and the amount of mortgages on the estates. We think it well to repeat what we stated to you at our interview that a receiving order will be applied for immediately execution is issued." On the 18th of July, 1894, execution was levied, and the next day H. presented his own petition, on which a receiving order was made and adjudication followed. Between the 4th of June and the 11th of July H.'s solicitors received about £3,000, rents of his estates, which under his instructions they bonâ fide paid away to various creditors. The trustee in bankruptcy claimed payment of the £3,000 from the solicitors on the ground that the letter of the 4th of June was an act of bankruptcy, and that his title related back to that date.

Held, that under the circumstances the letter was not equivalent to a notice by H. that he was about to suspend payment of his debts, and therefore it was not an act of bankruptcy.—Hill (Trustees of) v. Rowlands, BKCY.

4. Act of bankruptcy—Oral notice of suspension of payment by non-trader—Banbruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 4, sub-section 1 (h).—A statement by a debtor who is not a trader that he is unable to pay his debts should not be construed as a notice of intention to suspend payment unless accompanied by a statement tending to show that the debtor proposes to deal with his creditors collectively.—Scott, Re, Scott, Ex parte, BKCY., 587.

5. Assets—After-acquired property—Personal earnings—Estoppel by record of county court—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 44, 53.—A bankrupt is only entitled to retain so much of his personal earnings as are reasonably necessary for the maintenance of himself and family, the remainder passes to his trustee.

The decision of a county court upon an issue between the bankrupt and the trustee, that certain weekly payments due to the bankrupt under an agreement are in the nature of personal earnings, estops the trustee from subsequently arguing in the High Court, when farther weekly payments become due under the same agreement, that they are not in the nature of personal earnings.—Graydon, Re, Official Receiver, Ex parte, BKCY., 495.

6. Assets—Assignment—Equitable chose in action—Assignment to trustees—Notice of assignment not given—Disclaimer by trustees—Bankruptcy of assignor "Possession, order, or disposition of bankrupt"—"Consent of true owner"—Infant beneficiaries—Incapacity to consent—Bankruptcy Act, 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 106), ss. 125, 141—Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 44, sub-section 3.—The owner of a reversionary interest under a will settled his interest upon his wife and children in the year 1861, and became bankrupt in the year 1865. The trustees of the settlement had no knowledge of its existence till after the settlor's bankruptcy, when they at once "rejected the trusts." Subsequently the reversionary interest fell into possession, when the trustees of the will, who, prior to the bankruptcy, had no notice of the settlement, paid the fund into court under the Trustees Relief Act. Some years afterwards the assignee in bankruptcy claimed the fund.

Held, that the assignee in bankruptcy had no title to the fund.

By Kekewich, J., on the ground that the trustees of the will had notice of the settlement before they paid the money into court and before they knew that the assignee in bankruptcy claimed the fund.

By the Court of Appeal, because the fund was not, at the date of the bankruptcy, in the "possession, order, or disposition" of the bankrupt settlor "with the consent of the true owner" within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Acts, the "true owners" being the beneficiaries, some of whom were infants, and therefore incapable of consenting.—Mills Trusts, Re, C.A., 21.

7. Assets—Assignment of future payments—Bankruptcy of assignor—Title of trustee in bankruptcy to payments accruing after bankruptcy—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 43, 44.—An assignment for value by a trader of future weekly payments accruing to the trader under a contract for the hiring of property belonging to the trader is, as regards those payments accruing due after the bankruptcy of the trader, inoperative as against the trustee in the bankruptcy, and such assignment does not pass to the assignee the right to future payments accruing after the date of the bankruptcy.

Such future weekly payments accruing under such a contract are not "debts."—Wilmot v. Alton, Q.B.D.

8. Assets—Realisation of—Bankrupt's duty—Property abroad—Refusal to execute power of attorney—Contempt—Committal—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 24, 168.—A bankrupt, whose only asset was land abroad, refused to execute a power of attorney to enable the trustee to sell the same at a fair price, on the ground that the power of attorney was informal, and the price offered for the land too small.

Held, that such refusal was under the circumstances unreasonable, and that an order of committal must be made, but not enforced, if within fourteen days the bankrupt executed a power of attorney in a form approved of by the registrar.—Harris, Re, BKCY.

9. Bankruptcy notice—Address of creditor—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (c. 52), s. 4 (1) (g)—Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, r. 136, Appendix, Part I., Form 6.—A bankruptcy notice gave as the address of the creditor who issued the notice "White's Club, St. James' Square, S.W." The creditor did not reside at the club, and was in fact out of England during the whole of the seven days limited by the notice for payment of the debt. The evidence showed that if the debtor had gone to the club he would have been referred to the creditor's London solicitor who had power of attorney to receive payment of the debt.

Held, that an address at which the creditor could not be found but only heard of, was not such an address as was required by the Bankruptcy Act and Rules; and consequently that the notice was invalid, and that non-payment of the debt within the seven days did not constitute an act of bankruptcy.—Leigh, Ex parte, Stogdon, Re, C.A.

10. Company—Conveyance with intent to defeat and delay creditors—Conversion of bankrupt's business into a limited company—Respective rights of creditors of the bankrupt and of the limited company.—The bankrupt, when insolvent, had converted his business into a "one-man" company, limited.

Held, that the trustee in bankruptcy was entitled to a declaration that the conveyance of the bankrupt's business to the company was void against him, and that he was entitled to take the assets of the company; but that he must pay the new creditors of the company in full, in priority to the creditors of the bankrupt.—Carey, Re, Jeffries, Ex parte, C.A., 59.

11. Composition—Secured creditor—Death of debtor—Administration action—Claim by mortgagee to prove—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 18, sub-section 11; s. 108—Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, r. 211.—A receiving order having been made against H. on his own petition, H. made a composition with his creditors under section 18 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, which provided for their being paid by instalments extending over a year, and died shortly after the expiration of the year. The instalments were not paid, and an action was commenced in the Chancery Division by a creditor to administer H.'s estate. Certain mortgagees of H., who had neither attended the creditors' meeting nor assented to the composition, took out a summons in the Chancery action to be admitted as creditors in that action in respect of the balance of the mortgage debt after deducting the assessed value of their security.

Held, on the principle of Ex parte Sharp, 34 W. R. 550, that under sections 108 and 18, sub-section 11, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, the Court of Bankruptcy would have jurisdiction to proceed notwithstanding H.'s death, and would apply its powers and exercise its jurisdiction in favour of the applicants; and the plaintiff in the Chancery action having submitted to take the opinion of the Chancery Court as to what would be the result of the applicant's proceeding in bankruptcy, the application of the mortgagees was consequently allowed.—Hardy, Re, Hardy v. Farmer, CH.D. CHITTY, J., 503.

12. Costs—Security for costs—Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, r. 131.—A debtor appealed against a receiving order made against him in the Swansea County Court, and, pursuant to rule 131 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, paid into court £20 as security for the costs of the appeal. The petitioning creditor applied that the security might be increased to £50, on the ground that the cost of bringing up his witnesses from the country would alone exceed £20.

Held, that no special circumstances were shown for increasing the amount of the usual security for costs, and that the application must be dismissed.—Phillips, Re, Treboeth Brick Co., Ex parte, BKCY.

13. Costs—Set off of costs of an appeal to a Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division against costs of an appeal to the Divisional Court in Bankruptcy—Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, r. 353.—The costs of an appeal to a Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division cannot be set off against the costs of an appeal to the Divisional Court in Bankruptcy. —Bassett, Re, Lewis, Ex parte, BKCY., 240.

14. Costs—Taxation of trustee's costs—Member of committee of inspection employed as solicitor—Profit derived from transaction arising out of the bankruptcy —Sanction of the court—Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, r. 317.—By rule 317 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, it is provided that "no member of a committee of inspection of an estate shall, except under and with the sanction of the court, directly or indirectly, by himself or any employer, partner, clerk, agent, or servant, be entitled to derive any profit from any transaction arising out of the bankruptcy, or to receive out of the estate any payment for services rendered by him in connection with the administration of the estate, or for any goods supplied by him to the trustee for or on account of the estate."

Held, that such "sanction of the court" must be given before the transaction from which the profit is to be derived is undertaken, and cannot be given after the profit is derived.

Held also, that the "profit" derived by a solicitor is the amount of his costs less disbursements out of pocket, and no allowance can be made in respect of office expenses.

Per Lord Esher, M.R.—It is not a proper practice for a solicitor to accept a retainer from a committee of inspection, one of whom is a clerk to his firm, to act as solicitor to the trustee in bankruptcy; and if a solicitor is so retained, the court, on application, ought to set aside such retainer.—Gallard, Re, Gallard, Ex parte, C.A., 121.

15. Costs—Taxation—Right of official receiver to be present at taxation—Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, rr. 120-124.—The official receiver has no right to be present or to be heard at the taxation of the bill of the solicitors to the trustee, or of any other persons, but the court has power to order him to attend at the taxation, not as a litigant party, but merely to assist the taxing officer, or to enable himself to report efficiently to the Board of Trade, in case they should require the taxation to be reviewed.— Nash, Re, Crofton, Ex parte, BKCY., 112.

16. Discharge subject to conditions—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 28 (2)—Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 71), s. 8 (2).—Where an order of discharge has been granted subject to onerous conditions, and it appears that the creditors will benefit but slightly by the continuance of such conditions, while the bankrupt will be thereby unduly oppressed, the court will venture to disregard the interest of the creditors and grant the bankrupt an unconditional discharge.—Durnford, Re, Durnford, Ex parte, BKCY., 272.

17. Execution—Money paid "under an execution" —"To avoid sale"—Payment to sheriff before seizure—Bankruptcy of debtor—Right of execution creditor—Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 71), s. 11, sub-section 2.—Where the amount of a judgment debt is paid to the sheriff, before the judgment debtor's goods have been seized in execution, in order to prevent a seizure, the money is not paid "under an execution in order to avoid sale" within the meaning of section 11, sub-section 2, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, and therefore the sheriff, upon a bankruptcy petition being presented against the debtor within fourteen days, is not justified in paying the money to the official receiver, but must pay it over to the execution creditor.—Bower v. Hett, C.A., 4.

18. Landlord and tenant—Distress—"Rent accrued due prior to date of order of adjudication"—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 42 (1).—A landlord let premises at £200 a year, but agreed to take £100 a year for the first two years and £250 a year for the succeeding two years of the term. The tenants became bankrupt before the first two years had expired, and the landlord distrained for rent at the rate of £200 a year.

Held, that he was entitled to distrain for rent at that rate, for the agreement had not altered the rent, but only the mode of paying it, and was not such that the tenant could claim to enforce it if he were in default in the payments thereunder.—Smith and Hartogs, Re, Official Receiver, Ex parte, BKCY., 79.

19. Order and disposition—Consent of true owner —Assignment of book debts—No notice by assignee to book debtors—Receiver appointed under Conveyancing Act, 1881—Extent of authority—Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 44, sub-section 2 (3).—The general rule is that the assignee of a debt, in order to take it out of the order and disposition of the assignor, must give notice of the assignment to the debtor.

In the absence of such notice, and on the bankruptcy of the assignor, consent on the part of the true owner of the debt to the debt remaining in the order and disposition of the bankrupt is primâ facie to be inferred, but that inference may be rebutted if the true owner takes every possible step to obtain possession of the debt, or if the failure to obtain possession is not attributable to any fault of his own.

The appointment of a receiver under a mortgage deed, although subsequently confirmed by the court, is, however, not sufficient to rebut that inference.— Rutter v. Everett, CH.D. STIRLING, J., 104.

20. Pension—Jurisdiction—Pension of native officer of Indian Army—Order of court to set aside part of pension—Discretion of the court—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 53, sub-section 2—Indian Pensions Act, 1871 (Indian Act No. XXIII.), ss. 11, 12.—Under section 53, sub-section 2, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), the court has jurisdiction to order payment to the trustee in bankruptcy of a pension which, by the Pensions Act, 1871 (Indian Act No. XXIII.), ss. 11 and 12, is declared to be inalienable. The discretion of the court to make such an order is absolute, and there is no rule or canon of law that can in the least fetter the exercise of such discretion.

Dicta of Vaughan Williams and Kennedy, JJ., [1895] 2 Q. B., pp. 120, 122, that the court ought not to exercise its discretion by making an order under section 53 with regard to an Indian pension, overruled.—Saunders, Re, Saunders, Ex parte, C.A., 30.

21. Petition—Inequitable proceeding—Debt payable at future time—Amount of debt for which petition should be presented—Rebate of interest—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 6, sub-section 1 (b); s. 7, sub-section 3.—A debt due on a promissory note at three months which are unexpired is a good petitioning creditor's debt, although the lender has given the borrower the option of renewing the note at the expiration of every three months on payment of forehand interest.

On presenting a petition for a debt payable in future the creditor must allow a rebate of interest.

It is not inequitable to take proceedings in bankruptcy upon a note not yet due, and given with such option of renewal, in a case where the creditor has notice of an act of bankruptcy committed by the debtor.—Barr, Re, Wolfe, Ex parte, BKCY., 586.

22. Petition—Practice—Attendance of petitioning creditor—Right of debtor to cross-examine—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 7—Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, rr. 162, 164.—Upon the hearing of a petition the registrar refused to allow the petitioning creditor to be cross-examined, upon the grounds that, the debt being based upon a judgment and verified by affidavit, no right to cross-examine arose until evidence had been given to displace the judgment.

Held by the court, that the grounds of the registrar's decision was wrong.

By Vaughan Williams, J., that unless the petitioning creditor's attendance is dispensed with by the court under rule 164, he must be present at the hearing, whether he is a witness to any matter or not, and that the reason for such practice is that questions may be put to him.

By Wright, J., that it does not follow from the statute or the rules that the petitioning creditor need be present unless required as a witness, or that there is any right to cross-examine him unless he gives evidence.—Purrett, Re, Purrett, Ex parte, BKCY., 171

23. Proof—Guarantee to bankers for whole account with limited liability—Proof by creditor after payment by surety—Admission of proof in full.—A surety guaranteed the whole of the indebtedness of S. to a bank, but the total amount recoverable from him was not to exceed £300. Subsequently a receiving order was made against S. when his indebtedness to the bank amounted to over £700. The surety paid the £300 to the bank, after which they presented a proof for the whole debt.

Held, that they were entitled to prove for the whole of their debt, for, the guarantee being for the whole amount, the surety could not prove against the estate unless he paid the bank in full.—Sass, Re, National Provincial Bank of England, Ex parte, BKCY., 588.

24. Protected transaction—Bonâ fide dealing with bankrupt—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 49.—The protection afforded by section 49 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, to a bonâ fide transaction with a bankrupt entered into before the date of the receiving order extends to the case where the transaction in question constitutes the act of bankruptcy on which the receiving order was made.—Shears v. Goddard, C.A., 402.

25. Protected transaction—Mortgage of chose in action—Notice of act of bankruptcy—Order and disposition—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 44, 49.—The bankrupt had assigned a debt coming due to him to secure an advance of £30 in October, 1890. The mortgagee failed to give notice of this assignment. In June, 1892, after an act of bankruptcy, but without notice thereof, the mortgagee advanced a further sum to the bankrupt and took a fresh assignment of the same debt to cover both the loans of 1890 and 1892. Of this assignment the mortgagee gave due notice.

Held, that the notice given of the second assignment was equivalent to a taking possession of the subject matter thereof, and, coupled with the deed of June, 1892, was a dealing for valuable consideration and protected by section 49 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and that the mortgagee having taken possession by this notice could then set up both the deeds of 1890 and 1892.—Seaman, Re, Furness Finance Co., Ex parte, BKCY., 496.

26. Protected transaction—Notice of act of bankruptcy—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 4, sub-section 1 (h); s. 49, sub-section 2.—Knowledge by a creditor that the debtor's solicitor has instructions to prepare a notice that the debtor intends to suspend payment of his debts is not notice to such creditor that the debtor has committed an act of bankruptcy.—Morgan, Re, Turner, Ex parte, BKCY., 96.

27. Receiving order—No assets—"Sufficient cause"—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 7, sub-section 3.—The mere fact that a debtor has apparently no assets is not a sufficient cause why a receiving order in bankruptcy should not be made against him.—Leonard, Re, Leonard, Ex parte, C.A., 438.

28. Receiving order—Rescission—Money paid into court to meet claims of creditors who cannot be found—Statute of Limitations (21 Jac. 1, c. 16), s. 3—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 35, 36.—When a debtor has paid money into court to meet the claims of creditors who cannot be found, the Statute of Limitations does not run against such claims, and the debtor is not entitled of right to have such money paid out to him after the expiration of six years during which no claim has been made to it.

The court may, however, as a matter of grace, allow the debtor to have the money paid out to him, upon his giving reasonable security to repay the same in the event of any creditors appearing to claim it.—Dennis, Re, Dennis, Ex parte, BKCY., 170.

29. Sale of goods of bankrupt by auctioneer—Auctioneer's lien—"Giving of credit"—"Mutual dealings"—Section 38 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52).—One L. instructed a firm of auctioneers to sell certain property, and a sum of money became due to them in respect of their charges in connection with such sale. Subsequently L. delivered to them certain goods as bailees with authority to sell them. L. became bankrupt, without having revoked the authority.

Held, that the credit given by the auctioneers to L. in respect of their charges, and the credit given by L. to the auctioneers in respect of the goods to be sold and the money to be realized by such sale was a giving of credit to the auctioneers, and constituted "mutual dealings" between them and L. within the meaning of section 38 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.—Palmer v. Day, Q.B.D., 14.

30. Trustee—Appointment—Objection by Board of Trade—Notification to High Court—Discretion of High Court—Trustee an accounting party to the estate—Costs—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 21.—When the Board of Trade notify an objection to the appointment of a trustee to the High Court, the court will not exercise any discretion, nor take into consideration the peculiar circumstances of the case, but will merely hear the facts alleged to constitute the objection, and decide as a question of law whether they constitute a valid objection or not.

An objection that the trustee appointed in the bankruptcy had been trustee under a deed of assignment executed by the debtor for the benefit of his creditors within three months of the presentation of the petition is a valid objection.—Mardon, Re, Board of Trade, Ex parte, BKCY., 111.

31. Trustee—Liability to render account—Board of Trade—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 162, sub-section 2 (a) (b)—Trustee Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 59), s. 8.—The words "any such trustee or other person" contained in section 162, subsection 2 (b) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1888, apply to a trustee or any other person empowered to collect, receive, or distribute any funds or dividends under any of the four Acts of Parliament mentioned in the fourth schedule to that Act.

It is not necessary for the Board of Trade, on an application to enforce under sub-section 2 (b) against a trustee an account of the sums received and paid by him, to show that the trustee has had in his hands, since the passing of the Act of 1883, funds which he has not distributed.

Section 8 of the Trustee Act, 1888, which limits the claims upon trustees, does not apply to a trustee in bankruptcy.—Cornish, Re, Board of Trade, Ex parte, C.A., 161.

BASTARDY:—

1. Affiliation summons—Putative father leaves England before birth of child—Ceases "to reside in England within twelve months next after the birth"—Bastardy Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 65), s. 3.—Where the alleged father of a bastard child born on the 30th of January, 1894, left England in December, 1893, and did not return until March, 1895,

Held, that he "ceased to reside in England within twelve months next after the birth of such child" within the meaning of section 3 of the Bastardy Act, 1872, so that the mother could take out an affiliation summons at any time within the twelve months next after his return to England.—Reg. v. Evans, Q.B.D., 271.

2. Service of summons—"Last place of abode"—Validity of service—Jurisdiction of justices—Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 65), s. 4.—A summons under section 4 of the Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1872, may be served at the "last place of abode" of the person summoned, although that person is out of the jurisdiction at the date of such service.

At the hearing of an application for an affiliation order it was proved that the summons had been served by being left at the house where the person summoned had resided up to a day seven days before the date of the service; and that on that day he left the house with the intention of proceeding to America. It was not proved that he had obtained a place of abode in America at the date of the service. He did not appear, and the justices, after hearing evidence, made an affiliation order against him.

Held, that the service was valid, and that the justices had jurisdiction to make the order.—Dicta of the Earl of Selborne, L.C., in Berkley v. Thompson, 33 W. R. 525, 10 App. Cas. 45, and of Kay, L.J., in Reg. v. Farmer, 40 W. R. 228, [1892] 1 Q. B. 637, considered.—Reg. v. Webb, Q.B.D., 527.

BILL of EXCHANGE:—

1. Cheque—Payee a fictitious or non-existing person—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 61), s. 7 (3).—A clerk in the plaintiff's employment, by means of a fraud, induced the plaintiffs to sign and issue cheques, the name of the payee of which was not the name of any real person.

Held, that the payee was a fictitious or non-existing person within the meaning of section 7 (3) of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, and that the plaintiffs were liable on the cheques, notwithstanding the payee was not fictitious to the knowledge of the plaintiffs.—Clutton v. Attenborough, C.A., 114.

2. Foreign bill—Negotiation—Payment under a mistake of fact as to bill having been met—Action for repayment—Estoppel.—A., the indorsee of a bill of exchange, resident abroad, indorsed it to the defendants, his agents in London, for the purpose of collection. The defendants indorsed the bill to the plaintiffs, and sent it to them for the same purpose, and they forwarded it to their agents.

The plaintiffs, under a misunderstanding, informed the defendants that the bill had been paid, and sent them a cheque for the amount. Thereupon the defendants intimated the same to A., and credited him with the amount of the bill.

It was decided by Mathew, J., on the authority of Skyring v. Greenwood & Cox, 4 B. & C. 281, that as the plaintiffs had wrongfully informed the defendants that the bill had been paid, they could not recover the amount of the bill when the defendants had nothing to do with the mistake of fact; and also that the plaintiffs were estopped by the representation which they had made to the defendants, and upon which the defendants had acted. On appeal:

Held (affirming the decision of Mathew, J.), that the action failed.—Deutsche Bank v. Beriro, C.A.

3. Forged indorsement — Payment to bonâ fide holder — Right to recover money. — When a bill becomes due and is presented for payment, and is paid in good faith and the money is received in good faith, if such an interval of time has elapsed that the position of the holder may have been altered, the money so paid cannot be recovered from the holder, although indorsements on the bill subsequently prove to be forgeries.—London and River Plate Bank v. Bank of Liverpool, Q.B.D.

4. Promissory note—On demand—Maturity—Gift—Renunciation—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 61), ss. 62, 89.—A promissory note payable to a specified person without the words "order" or "bearer" is a negotiable instrument within the meaning of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. Such a note, when made payable "on demand," is "at maturity" as soon as it is made, and therefore, under sections 62 and 89 of the Act, if the holder of the note desire to renounce all rights in it, the renunciation must be in writing, unless the note is delivered to the acceptor in person, though possibly delivery to the acceptor's legal personal representative will suffice.

Accordingly, where the holder of a note made a parol renunciation of all rights in it and delivered the note to one of the devisees of the real estate of the acceptor, who by his will had charged his real estate with payment of his debts, the renunciation was held to be insufficient.—Edwards v. Walters, C.A., 547.

5. Promissory note—Unnecessary provisions—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 61), s. 83 (3).—A document provided for the payment of a certain sum by instalments, with interest, the whole to become due on default of one instalment, and that "no time given to, or security taken from, or composition arrangements entered into with, either party hereto shall prejudice the rights of the holder to proceed against any other party."

Held, that the document was not a promissory note.—Kirkwood v. Smith, Q.B.D., 480.

BILL of SALE:—

1. Condition or defeasance—Book of "rules and regulations"—Payment of principal and interest by instalments—Form—Validity—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31), s. 10 (3)—Bills of Sale Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), Schedule.—The plaintiff, having borrowed £100 from the defendant, executed a bill of sale, which provided for the repayment of the sum by instalments. Upon paying the first instalment, about a month after the execution of the bill of sale, the plaintiff received from the defendant a book in which to enter receipts for instalments, and which contained upon the cover a "notice" and certain "rules and regulations which are strictly adhered to." The "notice" and the "rules and regulations" prejudicially affected the position of the plaintiff as borrower, and the defendant subsequently attempted to enforce the rules against him.

Held (reversing the decision of Kekewich, J.), that the "notice" and the "rules and regulations" were not in any way a part of the bargain, and could not be considered as a "condition or defeasance" so as to avoid the bill of sale under section 10 (3) of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878.

The bill of sale provided for the repayment of the £100 and interest as follows: "The sum of £6 on the 5th of December, 1894, on account of interest and principal, and a like sum of £6 on account, as aforesaid, on the 5th day of each and every succeeding month thereafter."

Held, that, upon the true construction of the bill of sale, instalments of £6 were to be paid until the last instalment, when, if less than £6 was found to be due, such less sum only was to be paid; that, though the calculation involved might be a little more difficult than in the case of the form in the schedule to the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, the bill of sale was not thereby rendered void; and that there was nothing in the form in the schedule which forbids a loan upon the terms that the principal and interest shall both be paid by equal instalments.

In re Bargen, [1894] 1 Q. B. 444, approved.—Linfoot v. Pocket, C.A., 66.

2. Fraudulent assignment—Intent to defeat and delay creditors—13 Eliz. c. 5.—The appellant made an advance of £600 in good faith to a man apparently solvent, but who afterwards became bankrupt, taking as security an assignment of the stock-in-trade, book debts, and other property of his debtor. It was arranged that the bill of sale was not to be registered, but there was no evidence that the assignment was made with intent to defeat or delay creditors. Possession was only taken by the appellant just before the bankruptcy, but in time to prevent the instrument being avoided under the Bills of Sale Act.

Held, that the title of the appellant was complete, and did not depend upon his taking possession, though, if he had not done so, the provisions of the Bills of Sale Act might, in certain events, have deprived him of his security.

3. Industrial and provident society—Debenture—Non-registration—Winding up—Incorporated company—Bills of Sale Acts, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31) and 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), s. 17.—Debentures issued by an industrial and provident society established under the Industrial and Provident Societies Act are not exempted from the provisions of the Bills of Sale Acts by section 17 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882.—Great Northern Railway Co. v. Coal Co-operative Society, CH.D. VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., 252.

4. Statutory form—Maintenance or defeasance of security—Attesting witness.—A bill of sale was given to secure the repayment of money advanced by several creditors of the grantor, in order to enable him to pay a composition to them and to others of his creditors. It contained stipulations that the grantor, a trader, should not during the existence of the security obtain credit to the extent of £10 without the consent of one of the firms parties thereto, but this clause was not to apply to purchases of goods from any of those firms; that the grantor would give them the greater portion of his business, and that he would keep proper books of account of his business, and permit any of the firms or their agent to inspect the same.

Held, that the insertion of those stipulations rendered the bill of sale void, under section 9 of the Act of 1882, as not in accordance with the form in the schedule.

The sole attesting witness of the bill of sale was the agent and manager of one of the firms who were grantees. He had conducted the negotiations with respect to the giving of the bill of sale and the payment of the composition, and he had to see that such composition was paid to the creditors other than the grantees.

Held, the bill of sale was duly attested, because the attesting witness was not a "party thereto" within the meaning of section 10 of the Act of 1882.—Peace v. Brooks, Q.B.D.

BREAD:—

Sale otherwise than by weight—"French or fancy bread"—Usually so sold—3 Geo. 4, c. 106, s. 4; and the Bread Act, 1836 (6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 37), s. 4.—Bread, though it be made by a different process or of better materials than ordinary household bread, is not fancy bread within 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 37, if it be similar in size, shape, and appearance to ordinary household bread as usually sold, and therefore it must be sold by weight.

The appellants manufactured a superior kind of bread. The chief difference between it and ordinary household bread was that a peculiar yeast, the nature of which was a trade secret, was used in its production. It was sold in loaves which, in size, shape, and appearance, resembled ordinary loaves of household bread. These loaves were not sold by weight. The respondent summoned the appellants before the justices for breach of section 4 of 3 Geo. 4, c. 106 (similar to section 4 of 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 37), and the justices convicted, holding that the appellants' bread was not fancy bread, and should therefore be sold by weight. On appeal by special case:

Held, that the conviction was right.—V. V. Bread Co. v. Stubbs, Q.B.D.

BUILDING SOCIETY:—

1. Instrument of dissolution—Signatures—Infants—Joint holders—Agents—Curing invalidity by adding names to duplicate instrument—Building Societies Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 42), ss. 32 (3), 38, 39.—In counting the three-fourths of the members required by section 32, sub-section 3, of the Building Societies Act, 1874, to consent to the dissolution of a building society (1) infants may be counted unless prohibited by the rules from assenting to the dissolution; (2) joint holders of shares must all sign, but only count as one; (3) semble, a member signing by his duly authorized agent may be counted.

An instrument of dissolution which is invalid through not containing the requisite number of signatures, and which has been registered, is not cured by adding names to the duplicate of the instrument returned to the society by the Registrar of Building Societies.—Dennison v. Jeffs, CH.D. NORTH, J., 476.

2. Investing member — Withdrawal — Priorities — Notice of withdrawal—Surplus funds of society.—In a building society, the rules of which provide that investing members may withdraw their shares upon giving a month's notice to the society, the stopping of the society's business, or the recognition of the necessity of stoppage by the officers of the society, and not the insolvency of the society, is the proper point at which to draw the line in determining the question whether a notice to withdraw operates so as to give the member giving such notice priority over other members.—Ambition Investment Building Society, Re, CH.D. VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., 141.

3. Withdrawing member—Repayment of advances —Priorities — Instrument of dissolution — Building Societies Act, 1874, ss. 18, 32.—The priorities, under the rules of a building society, of the withdrawing members over those who have given no notice of withdrawal cannot be varied by an instrument of dissolution executed under the Building Societies Act, 1874, unless such variation has been previously sanctioned by a special meeting of the society summoned and held in accordance with the rules of the society and the terms of section 18 of the Act.—Botton v. City and Suburban Building Society, CH.D. STIRLING, J., 12.

BURIAL:—

Metropolis—Land set apart for the purposes of interment—Sold under the authority of an Act of Parliament—Michael Angelo Taylor's Act (57 Geo. 3, c. cxxix.)—Disused Burial Grounds Act, 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. 72), ss. 3, 5.—Land formerly used as a burial ground, situate in the City of London, was purchased by the Commissioners of Sewers under the provisions of Michael Angelo Taylor's Act, and was in part used by them for public purposes. The Commissioners sold the residue, and the purchasers proposed to erect buildings thereon. An action was brought to restrain this building.

Held, that the land in question had been sold or disposed of under the authority of an Act of Parliament within the meaning of section 5 of the Disused Burial Grounds Act, 1884, and might therefore be built upon.—Attorney-General v. London Parochial Charities, CH.D. STIRLING, J., 395.

CANADA, LAW of:—

1. Nova Scotia—Revised statutes, 5th series, c. 7, s. 95—Licence—Renewal—Repeal of section authorizing renewal--Statute--Construction.--The appellants having got a licence to work for two years under c. 7, s. 95, of the Revised Statutes, 5th series, afterwards applied under the same section for a renewal thereof; but in the meantime section 95 had been repealed by an amending Act of 1889.

Held, that at the date of the application to renew the licence the power to grant it was gone; for even if the amending Act were to be construed so as not to interfere with existing rights, the appellants only possessed a privilege, and not an accrued right, in reference to the renewal sought.

2. Ontario — Bye-laws — Construction — Power to regulate a trade does not include power to prohibit—Ontario Revised Statutes, 1887, c. 184, s. 495 (3).—A statutory power conferred upon a municipal council to make bye-laws for regulating and governing a trade does not, in the absence of an express power of prohibition, authorize the making it unlawful to carry on a lawful trade in a lawful manner.

So held, where, under c. 184 of Revised Statutes of Ontario, 1887, s. 495 (3), a municipal bye-law was passed prohibiting hawkers from plying their trade in an important part of the municipality, no question of apprehended nuisance having been raised.—Toronto (Corporation of) v. Virgo, P.C.

3. Principal — Agent — Power of attorney — Son procureur général et special—Civil Code, Art. 181.—Where, by a document indorsed "procuration générale et speciale, a wife, being sole owner, constituted her husband "son procureur général et special" to administer her affairs, specifying such acts as drawing bills of exchange and promissory notes,

Held, that the wife's liability extended to all promissory notes granted by the husband, and was not limited by Article 181 of the Civil Code to such notes as were required for the purposes of the administration.—La Banque D'Hochelaga v. Jodoin, P.C.

4. Liquor Laws—Power of prohibition—Distribution of legislative powers—Canada Temperance Act, 1886—Ontario Act (53 Vict. c. 56) s. 18.—The Canada Temperance Act, 1886, so far as purports to repeal the prohibitory clauses of the old provincial Act of 1864 (c. 18)

Held, ultra vires the Dominion Parliament. The prohibitory provisions of the former Act are, however, valid when duly brought into operation in any provincial area, as relating to the peace, order, and good government of Canada; but not as regulating trade and commerce within section 91, sub-section 2, of the British North America Act, 1867.

Held also, that the local liquor prohibition authorized by the Ontario Act (53 Vict. c. 56), s. 18, are within the powers of the provincial Legislature; but they are inoperative in any locality which adopts the provisions of the Canada Temperance Act, 1886.—Ontario (Attorney-General) v. Dominion (Attorney-General), P.C.

CANAL:—

Special Act—Rochdale Canal Act, 1874 (34 Geo. 3, c. lxxviii.), ss. 39, 40—Right to support for canal—Mines adjacent to canal—Right of action for injury to canal.—Section 39 of the Rochdale Canal Act reserved to the owners of lands in, upon, or through which the canal was made the mines and minerals under the lands set out or made use of for the canal, and authorized the owners to work such minerals, not thereby injuring the canal. Section 40 provided that if the owner of any mine should in working such mine work near to or under the canal so as in the opinion of the canal company to endanger the canal, or in the opinion of owners of mines to endanger the further working of the mines, it should be lawful for the company to treat with the owner for all such minerals as might be near or under the canal as should be thought proper to be left for the security of the canal.

Held, that an owner of mines adjacent to but not under the canal did not come within section 39, and was under no statutory liability towards the company in working his mines; consequently, that if the working of such mines near the canal would not endanger the further working of the mines, although it would cause some damage to the canal, the owner could not under section 40 insist, against the wish of the company, upon minerals being left for the security of the canal so as to receive satisfaction therefor from the company.

The decision of the Court of Appeal ([1894] 2 Q. B. 632) affirmed, on the ground that the appellants were not entitled to proceed under section 40, their mines being adjacent to, but not under, the canal.—Chamber Colliery Co. v. Rochdale Canal Co., H.L.

CAPE of GOOD HOPE, LAW of:—

No. 3 of 1864, Schedule 17, s. 2, B—Construction—Company—Authority to carry on business in colony—Licence.—Where a company was authorized by its memorandum of association to carry on its business in any part of the world,

CARRIER:—

Goods shipped without bill of lading—Negligence—Shipowner's liability.—The plaintiff bought wool in London and handed the delivery order to the defendant, who shipped the goods on his ship to G., and sent them on to the plaintiff by rail, charging a through rate including insurance. The defendant selected the underwriters.

Held, that the defendant insured the goods not as agent for the plaintiff, but to cover his own liability as a carrier, that he was exercising a public calling, and had taken on himself the liabilities of a common carrier, and had not stipulated for any limitation thereof, and was therefore liable without proof of negligence.—Hill v. Scott, C.A.

CHAMPERTY.—See CONTRACT, 5.

CHARITY:—

1. Charitable bequest—"Respectable single women of good character above the age of sixty years"—Validity.—A testator gave the remainder of his estate to trustees upon trust for conversion, and to pay the proceeds to the rector and churchwardens of a parish, who should invest the same and pay the income thereof "amongst respectable single women of good character above the age of sixty years, to be paid by monthly instalments, but so that no recipient shall receive more than £10 per annum."

Held, that the intention must be taken to have been the relief of distress, and that the gift was therefore good as a charitable bequest.

2. Charitable purposes—Intention to benefit the community — Anti-vivisection societies. — Institutions whose objects are lawful and intended to benefit the community may be charities, although the achievement of their objects might not in fact benefit, or tend to benefit, the community.

The "Victoria-street joined with the International Society for the Total Suppression of Vivisection" and "The London Anti-Vivisection Society, Sackville-street," are charities.—Foveaux's Estate, Re, Cross v. London Anti-Vivisection Society, CH.D. CHITTY, J.

3. Deed of foundation—Sale by trustees under power—Consent of Charity Commissioners—"Scheme legally established"—Charitable Trusts Amendment Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 124), s. 29.—The deed of foundation of a charity duly enrolled under 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, is not a "scheme legally established" within the meaning of section 29 of the Charitable Trusts Amendment Act, 1855. Consequently the trustees of such a charity in whom lands are vested cannot sell the lands under a power of sale contained in the deed without first obtaining the consent of the Charity Commissioners to the sale.

The trustees of a charity having a power of sale can only exercise their power of sale with the express authority of Parliament, or of a court or judge of competent jurisdiction, or according to a scheme legally established, or with the approval of the Charity Commissioners.

Decision of Stirling, J., (ante, p. 61), affirmed.—Mason's Orphanage and London and North-Western Railway Co., Re, C.A., 339.

4. Endowed Schools Acts—Commissioners—Scheme—Excepted endowments—Compulsory application in aid of scheme—Cy-près—Jurisdiction of court—Endowed Schools Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 56), s. 14 (1).—The effect of section 14 of the Endowed Schools Act, 1869, is to leave the governing body of a charity in statu quo as to the endowments thereby excepted, and no scheme affecting those excepted endowments can be forced on such governing body unless it could have been forced on them before the Act.

Where a governing body incorporated with full powers of management by Royal Charter and Act of Parliament are deprived of the bulk of their endowments by a scheme under the Endowed Schools Act, 1869, but nevertheless continue to apply the excepted endowments to proper legal objects, then, although those legal objects are only expressed in general terms in the Charter, the court cannot, under the guise of cy-près or otherwise, compel the governing body to apply the excepted endowments in aid of the scheme, however beneficial such application might be.—Attorney-General v. Christ's Hospital, CH.D. CHITTY, J., 379.

5. Will—Bequest for charitable or philanthropic purposes — Validity. — A testator by his will bequeathed a sum of money to be appropriated for some one or more purposes "charitable, philanthropic, or ."

Held, that this bequest was not invalid simply by reason of the blank; but

Held, further, that as the word "philanthropic" was wide enough to comprise purposes not within the technical meaning of "charitable," the gift was invalid.

Decision of Stirling, J. (ante, p. 344), affirmed.—Macduff, Re, Macduff v. Macduff, C.A.

6. Will—Gift to "service of God."—A gift by will for the "service of God" is a good charitable bequest.—Darling, Re, Farquhar v. Darling, CH.D. STIRLING, J., 75.

7. Will—Impure personalty—Direction to trustees to submit proposal for distribution among charities of property included in gift.—A testator gave his real and personal estate to trustees upon trust to sell and convert, and to apply one-tenth of his estate over and above £110,000 to such charitable institutions and objects as his trustees might determine.

He died in 1888, leaving realty and impure personalty as well as pure personal estate.

Held, that the gift to the charities carried realty and impure personalty, and was a gift of one-tenth of the testator's whole distributable estate over and above £110,000, not a gift of one-tenth of its value over and above £110,000 at the expiration of a year from the testator's death; and the trustees were directed to submit a proposal showing to what charitable institutions and objects, and in what sums they proposed to apply moneys available for distribution under the gift.—Piercy, Re, Whitwham v. Piercy, CH.D. NORTH, J.

CHURCH BUILDING ACTS:—

Mortgage by vicar—Land taken compulsorily—Money in court—Payment out—3 & 4 Vict. c. 60, s. 19.—Section 19 of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 60 does not limit the application of surplus land originally given for a church site and not required, or of the money representing such land, to purposes from which the incumbents in succession shall have the benefit or derive income, but the Ecclesiastical Commissioners may apply such land or money to purposes from which the successive incumbents would not derive benefit or income.

Held, therefore, that the court would order payment out of a fund, representing such surplus land, to be applied in paying off a mortgage made by the vicar in order to provide a vicarage and in executing repairs to the church, the proposed application of the fund having been approved by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners.—Christ Church, Greenwich, Vicar, Ex parte, London County Council, Re, CH.D. COMPANY:—

1. Borrowing powers—Debenture—Issue of debentures in satisfaction of debt—Fraudulent preference—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 164.—P., carrying on business as P. & Co., borrowed £150 from S. for the purposes of his business without security. S., not having been repaid, brought an action against P., and was in a position to sign judgment for the full amount. P. about this time formed a company to take over his business. The memorandum of association contained a clause authorizing the company to borrow or raise money by the issue of debentures and otherwise. The company was bound to indemnify P. against his debts and liabilities, as shown in the balance-sheet.

S. accepted, in discharge of his debt and interest, 7 per cent. first mortgage debentures of the company to the nominal value of £175. Proceedings were shortly afterwards taken to wind up the company, and S. commenced an action on behalf of himself and all other debenture-holders to enforce his security.

Held, that the directors were authorized and empowered to issue such debentures in satisfaction of the debt of P., and their validity was not affected because no money was actually raised or borrowed upon them. P. not being a bankrupt, the Bankruptcy Act and the doctrine of fraudulent preference cannot be applied in favour of his unpreferred creditors as such.

2. Borrowing powers—No power of borrowing—Subrogation—Interest.—A company which was formed for the purpose of buying and working a ship when the ship was ready for delivery requested J. W. (one of the directors) to advance the company £7,500 which was owing to the builders in respect of the price of the ship, in order that the company might obtain delivery of the ship. J. W. advanced the money to the company, to be repaid with interest at 7 per cent. The company paid off the builders therewith, and obtained possession of the ship. The memorandum of association of the company did not contain any power to borrow money for the purpose of paying for the ship or of providing capital for the undertaking. The company being wound up compulsorily, J. W. claimed the amount of his loan and interest at 7 per cent. per annum.

Held, that the company having no express power to borrow for the above purpose, the transaction with J. W. was ultra vires to the company as a loan; but that J. W. was entitled to repayment of the £7,500 as a creditor of the company by way of subrogation to the shipbuilders.

Held, also, that as there was no evidence that the shipbuilders were specifically entitled to interest in respect of the £7,500, J. W. was not entitled as an incident to the contract of subrogation to interest at 7 per cent. or any other agreed rate; but that the court could allow J. W. interest on the £7,500 at the court rate of 4 per cent.—Lough Neagh Ship Co., Re, M.R. (Ir.).

3. Borrowing power—Mortgage of uncalled capital—Power to mortgage—Companies Act, 1862, s. 50.—In the articles of a company limited by shares, incorporated in 1866, was a clause enabling the company "to borrow from time to time at interest upon mortgage of the freehold, copyhold, and leasehold hereditaments, machinery, works, and other property and effects for the time being of the company, or any of them, or any part thereof respectively, or upon bonds or debenture notes of the company, or in such other manner as the company may determine."

Held, that while, according to Stanley's case, 12 W. R. 894, 5 De G. J. & S. 407, and In re Sankey Brook Co., 18 W. R. 914, L. R. 10 Eq. 381, the words in the first part of the clause did not authorize a charge on uncalled capital, yet reading the last part, and having regard to the wide meaning of the word "manner," on the proper construction of the clause as a whole such a charge was thereby authorized.

Held, also, that even if the clause in the articles did not comprise a power to charge uncalled capital, yet the company might, under section 50 of the Companies Act, 1862, by a special resolution, alter the clause so as to make it comprise an authority to charge uncalled capital.—Jackson v. Rainford Coal Co., CH.D. CHITTY, J., 554.

4. Capital—Appreciation of investments—Capital or income—Earnings made after liquidation.—A company after liquidation cannot be treated as a going concern, and cannot therefore earn profits; earnings made after liquidation are capital, not income.

A company sunk part of its capital in the purchase at par of its own debentures. The debentures subsequently fell in value, and the amount of this fall was in the half-yearly accounts charged to revenue a depreciation." Upon the company going into liquidation it was found that the debentures had again risen to par value; the liquidator in his accounts credited the sum representing the increase, to revenue as "appreciation."

Held, that this increase must be treated as income, and not as capital; it being in reality not an accretion of principal, but merely a restitution to profits of what had been previously taken away from profits.

In re Bridgewater Navigation Co., [1891] 2 Ch. D. 317, discussed.—Bishop v. Smyrna and Cassaba Railway Co. (No. 2), CH.D. KEKEWICH, J.

5. Capital—Company formed to carry on financial operations—Assets—Investment—Surrender of part to improve remainder—Reduction of capital—Ultra vires—Memorandum of association—Companies Acts, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), s. 9, and 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 26), s. 3.—The surrender by a limited financial company of a part of a security, constituting one of its assets, for the purpose of improving the remainder, where the company is acting within the scope of its business as set forth in the memorandum of association, is not a reduction of capital within the Companies Acts, 1867 and 1877, requiring the sanction of the court.—Thomson v. Trustees Insurance Corporation, CH.D. KEKEWICH, J., 237.

6. Capital—Reduction of capital—Founders' shares—Extinguishment—Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), s. 9.—The shares in a company were divided into ordinary, preference, and founders' shares. Under the memorandum and articles of association the ordinary and founders' shares ranked equally for dividend, but the founders' shares entitled the holders thereof only to such capital as should be paid up on them, except in the event of the winding up of the company, in which event the holders of founders' shares were to be entitled to one moiety of any surplus assets remaining after discharging all liabilities. The memorandum of association authorized the issue of preference shares upon such terms as the company should by special resolution determine. The directors issued and allotted shares preferred both as to capital and dividend, without any special resolution having been passed; but at general meetings afterwards held of all classes of shareholders resolutions adopting the terms under which the preference shares had been issued were adopted.

A large loss of capital had been sustained by the depreciation of investments, and there was no reasonable prospect of anything going to the holders of founders' shares in respect of dividend or capital. The company presented a petition for the confirmation of resolutions for reduction of capital involving the extinction of the founders' shares and throwing the rest of the loss upon the ordinary shares.

Held (1), that the issue of preference shares without the passing of a special resolution was capable of ratification by the company, and had been ratified.

Held, further, that the loss should, in the first instance, be thrown on the holders of founders' shares.—London and New York Investment Corporation, Re, CH.D. STIRLING, J., 137.

7. Capital—Reduction of capital—List of creditors not to be dispensed with—Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), s. 13.—Where a company seeks the sanction of the court to a proposed reduction of capital, involving either the diminution of any liability in respect of unpaid capital or the payment to any shareholder of paid-up capital, the court has no jurisdiction to dispense with the settlement of a list of creditors of the company or with the ascertainment of the names of such creditors in manner provided by the 13th section of the Companies Act, 1867.—Lamson Store Service Co., Re, National Reversionary Co., Re, CH.D. STIRLING, J., 42.

8. Contract — Prospectus — Misrepresentation — Forfeiture—Companies Act, 1867, s. 38.—Where a person is induced to apply for shares by a fraudulent misrepresentation contained in a prospectus, and his shares are afterwards forfeited by his failure to pay calls, he ceases to be a shareholder and becomes a debtor to the company; and if he has not affirmed his contract he may repudiate it and defend an action for calls on that ground.

A prospectus which merely specifies the names of the parties to, and the dates of, contracts, in compliance with section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867, does not thereby give notice of circumstances contained in the contracts which are material to be known, and the omission of which causes the prospectus to give a false impression.—Aarons Reefs v. Twiss, H.L.

9. Contract — Prospectus — Misrepresentation — Intention to induce purchase of shares—Liability to purchaser—Publication of false statements confirming those of prospectus—Purchase of shares by person who had received prospectus—Liability of person causing publication.—Where the object with which the prospectus of a company is issued is not merely to induce application for an allotment of shares, but also to induce persons to whom it is sent to purchase shares in the market, its function is not exhausted when the company has gone to allotment, and the person issuing the prospectus is responsible for the consequences of a false representation contained in it, and known to him at the time to be false, to any person to whom the prospectus has been sent who is induced by the false representation to purchase shares, and thereby sustains a loss.

Peek v. Gurney (L. R. 6 H. L. 377) distinguished.

Where a person who has issued the prospectus of a company, containing a false representation, known to him at the time to be false, subsequently causes to be published a false representation to the same effect as that of the prospectus, with the direct intent of inducing persons to purchase shares in the company, he is responsible for the consequences of so doing to anyone who, having received a prospectus, purchases shares on the faith of the false representation so published, and thereby sustains a loss.—Andrews v. Mockford, C.A.

10. Debentures — Floating security — Condition allowing company to carry on business until default for certain period — Subsequent issue of bonds—Priority.—A company issued debentures "by way of floating security," and subject to certain conditions, one of which was that, notwithstanding the charge, the company should be at liberty, for the purpose of its business, to deal with any part of its property until default should be made in payment of any interest thereby secured for a period of three months, or until the company should be compulsorily or voluntarily wound up. The company made default in payment of interest. More than three months after such default, but before the debenture-holders had taken any active steps to enforce their security, the company issued bonds covered by a trust deed, which recited the issue of the debentures and the fact that default had been made in the payment of interest.

Held, reversing the decision of North, J., that the bonds had priority over the debentures.

Governments Stock Investment Co. v. Manila Railway Co., C.A., 166.

11. Debentures—Receiver—Covering deed—Bills of Sale Acts, 1878 and 1882 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31), ss. 14, 17 —Poor rate—General district rate—Poor Relief Act, 1601 (43 Eliz. c. 2) s. 2—The Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 41), s. 16—The Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 5, 6, 211, sub-section (3)—Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), ss. 19, 24—Preferential Payments in Bankruptcy Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 62), s. 1 (a), sub-section (4).—A deed by which a company assigns as beneficial owner to a trustee all its property as security to cover debentures does not come within the Bills of Sale Acts.

Held, also on the facts, that although the powers of the receiver under the deed were wider than those conferred upon the receivers by the Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 24, that Act did not affect their validity, and that on the receiver taking possession of the premises and carrying on the business there was a change of occupation such as was contemplated by section 16 of the Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act, 1869, so that the receiver was not liable to pay the proportion of a rate incurred before he took possession.

The Preferential Payments in Bankruptcy Act, 1888, s. 1 (a), applies only to persons who hold in their hands assets in the winding up, but does not affect persons who are not claiming as creditors in the winding up, but who hold security upon property charged in their favour.

Semble, a "covering deed" may be a "debenture" within the meaning of the cases.

Semble also, that a general district rate made under the Public Health Act, 1875, is not a tax or parochial rate within the meaning of section 14 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882.

Richards v. Kidderminster (Overseers of), CH. D. NORTH, J., 505.

12. Debentures—Set off—Assignment of debt—Appointment of receiver—Time of assignment—Liquidated demand—Money had and received—Goods paid for but not delivered — Managing director — Acts within apparent authority.—Debentures issued by a limited company, being a floating charge on its assets, do not take effect as a charge as from the date of their issue, but only from the date of the appointment of a receiver on behalf of the debenture-holders, and then subject to the existing equities. A trader dealing with the company in the ordinary course of its business has an inchoate right of set-off against debts owing by him to the company before such date, even though he has notice of the issue of the debentures.

Where there is a claim for goods paid for but not delivered, the property in the goods not having passed, the claim becomes one for money had and received, upon a failure of consideration, and becomes a liquidated demand, and is a proper subject for set-off.

A company is bound by the acts of persons who take upon themselves, with the knowledge of the directors, to act for the company, provided such persons act within the limits of their apparent authority; and strangers dealing bonâ fide with such persons have a right to assume that they have been duly appointed. — Biggerstaffe v. Rowatt's Wharf, C.A., 536.

13. Directors—Expiration of term of office—No re-election — Authority — Estoppel — Companies Act, 1862, s. 67.—The provisions of section 67 of the Companies Act, 1862, for curing defects in the appointment or qualification of directors do not operate to render good the authority of former directors, who without being re-elected continue after the expiration of their term of office to discharge the duties of directors, well knowing they have not been re-elected. And the receipt of payments made by these as directors by one aware of their true position does not estop that person from subsequently questioning their legal authority to demand as directors payments from him.—Tyne Mutual SS. Insurance Association v. Brown, Q.B.D.

14. Directors—Meeting — Irregularity—Resolution to wind-up—Refusal of Court to interfere.—The notices convening the meeting at which a special resolution to wind-up voluntarily was passed by the shareholders of a company were issued under the authority of a resolution passed at a meeting of the boards of directors at which a quorum was not present. Six months afterwards the shareholders sought to have the special resolution declared invalid.

Held, that the doctrine upon which the court had acted since Foss v. Harbottle (2 Hare, 461), as was explained in Browne v. La Trinidad (37 Ch. D. 17), was not to interfere for the purpose of forcing companies to conduct their business according to the strictest rules, where the irregularity complained of could be set right at any moment; and that therefore, in the present case, the court would not interfere, especially as no application to the court had been made until six months had elapsed after the passing of the resolution.—Southern Counties Deposit Bank v. Rider, C.A.

15. Directors—Meeting—Notice of business to be transacted — "Extraordinary" business—Name of company, Authority to use.—In point of law directors of a company are not bound to give notice beforehand of extraordinary business which is to be transacted at a board meeting in order to render such business transactions valid.

S., a director of the M. Co., obtained the assent of five out of the seven subscribers to the memorandum of association of the company to the use of the name of the company as co-plaintiffs in an action brought by S. against his co-directors.

Held, that S. had no proper authority for the use of the name of the company. Such authority must be obtained either from the board of directors or from a meeting of the shareholders convened for that purpose.—Mayville (La Compagnie de) v. Whitley, C.A. 568.

16. General meeting—Voting—Show of hands—Declaration of chairman—Evidence to contradict—Sufficiency of notice of meeting—Table A, clause 42—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 51.—The provision in section 51 of the Companies Act, 1862, that the declaration of the chairman that a resolution has been carried shall be deemed conclusive evidence of the fact does not preclude the court from inquiring whether, in fact, the provisions of the Act have been complied with.—Young v. South African Exploration Co., CH.D. KEKEWICH, J., 509.

17. Private company—"Two men" company—Limited liability—Effect of registration under Companies Acts—Liability of corporators for company's debts.—The use of the Companies Acts for the purpose of enabling two partners to carry on business with limited liability is an abuse of those Acts; but, nevertheless, a company created by registration under these Acts is an effectual company, though it be formed for this purpose; and the contracts of such a company are not the contracts of the partners, and the partners cannot be sued personally on them, though possibly, if the partners and the company were both before the court, the creditors under the company's contracts might be held entitled to an indemnity from the partners personally.

Broderip v. Salomon, 43 W. R. 612, [1895] 2 Ch. 323, commented on and distinguished.—Munkittrick v. Perryman, Q.B.D.

18. Receiver—Equitable execution—Secured creditor—Judicature Act, 1875, s. 10—Companies Act, 1862, s. 163.—A judgment creditor of a company obtained ex parte an absolute order appointing him receiver over the beneficial interest of the company in a ship, subject to encumbrances. The creditor took no further step to enforce payment, and a winding-up order was afterwards made.

Held, that the receivership order did not make the judgment creditor a secured creditor of the company.

The expression secured creditor in section 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875, has the same meaning as regards a company in liquidation as it has under the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.—Lough Neagh Ship Co., Re, Thompson, Ex parte, M.R. (Ir.).

19. Shares—Certificate—"Fully-paid" shares—Estoppel—Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), s. 25.—A holder of shares in a company cannot relieve himself of his liability under section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, by alleging estoppel on the ground that the company gave him a certificate representing that the shares were fully paid up, if the circumstances were such that he must have known that no cash had been paid for the shares.

The appellant was the registered holder of 16,000 shares, in respect of which he had received certificates that they were fully paid up. He had paid no cash for the shares, and knew that the shares belonged to the company; no contract under section section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, had been registered before the issue of the shares.

Held, that, as under the circumstances of the case he must have known that nothing had been paid for the shares, he was liable to be put on the list of contributories for the full amount.—Monnier (Veuve et fils), Re, Bloomenthal, Ex parte, C.A., 577.

20. Shares — Contract — Misrepresentation — Promoter—Rescission of contract.—To make a company liable for misrepresentations inducing a contract to take shares, the shareholder must bring his case within one or other of the following heads: (1) Where the misrepresentations are made by the directors or other general agents entitled to act and acting on its behalf; (2) where the misrepresentations are made by a special agent of the company acting within the scope of his authority, and whether the company has originally authorized him or has subsequently ratified his acts; (3) where the company know before completion of the contract that it is induced by misrepresentation; or (4) where the contract is made on the basis of certain representations, whether the particulars of those representations were known to the company or not, and it turns out that some of them were material and untrue.

A promoter of a company, but who was not either a director or agent of the company to make representations, induced the plaintiff to take shares on the faith of certain allegations he was alleged to have made, but of which the company had no knowledge, though the directors did know he was endeavouring to procure subscriptions for shares.

Held, that even if the representations were made (which was not proved), the company could not be held liable for such representations made by a promoter; and that the contract to take shares could not be set aside.—Lynde v. Anglo-Italian Hemp Spinning Co., CH.D. ROMER, J., 359.

21. Shares—Contract to take shares—Prospectus—Rescission—Non-disclosure of material facts.—A person who has contracted to take shares in a company cannot avoid his contract on the ground that the prospectus did not set forth all the material facts pro and con. which might induce a person to apply or not apply for shares. A misstatement or concealment in a prospectus which will be sufficient to avoid the contract must be of such a character as to make the prospectus as it stands misleading.—Mackeown v. Boudard Peveril Gear Co., CH.D. ROMER, J., 664.

22. Shares—Dividends—Preference shares—Cumulative dividend—Payment out of net profits of each year.—The memorandum of association of a company contained this clause: "The capital of the company is £150,000 divided into 10,000 ordinary shares of £10 each, and 5,000 preference shares of £10 each. The holders of preference shares shall be entitled out of the net profits of each year to a preference dividend at the rate of £10 per cent. per annum on the amounts for the time being paid up or deemed to be paid up thereon. After payment of such preferential dividend the holders of ordinary shares shall be entitled to a like dividend at the rate of £10 per cent. per annum on the amount paid or deemed to be paid on such ordinary shares. Subject as aforesaid, the preference and ordinary shares shall rank equally for dividend."

Held, that the preference shareholders were not entitled to a cumulative dividend of £10 per cent. so as to have the deficiency in one year paid out of the profits of a subsequent year before paying anything to the ordinary shareholders.—Staples v. Eastman Photographic Materials Co., C.A.

23. Shares — Dividends — Unclaimed dividends—Winding up—Statute of Limitations.—The declaration of a dividend by a company on its shares constitutes a debt which becomes payable to the shareholder in respect of his dividend, and the Statute of Limitations begins to run immediately.

The mere declaration of a dividend will not make a company a trustee of the dividend for the shareholder to whom it is payable.

The reasons upon which the rule is founded that the Statute of Limitations does not run in respect of a claim between partners during the continuance of the partnership do not apply to a claim for unpaid dividends between a shareholder of an incorporated company and the company.—Severn and Wye and Severn Bridge Railway Co., Re, CH.D. ROMER, J., 347.

24. Shares—Fully-paid shares—Contract duly made and filed—Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), s. 25.—The A. company entered into a contract with a trustee for the B. company, a new company to be formed, that the A. company should sell to the new company certain patent rights in consideration of £2,550 in shares of the B. company or cash, and in consideration of the allotment and issue to each shareholder of the A. company who should apply for them, three shares of £1 each in the B. company, with 19s. credited as paid up on them, in respect of every two shares held by him in the A. company. The B. company was registered, and ratified this contract by a deed endorsed on it, and the contract with the indorsed deed were registered with the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies under section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, and the patent rights assigned. Two persons,

E. and M., not shareholders in the A. company, applied, as nominees of shareholders of that company who were entitled to have shares issued to them, for shares in the B. company, and, having paid 1s. per share, were registered as holders of fully paid-up shares in the B. company. On the B. company being subsequently wound up, and the liquidator applying for a declaration that these shares were held subject to a liability of 19s. per share,

Held, that the contract and indorsed deed when registered was a sufficient contract in writing as required by section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, even though E. and M. were not named in it or parties to it, and that the shares issued to them must be treated as fully paid up.

25. Shares—New shares—Allotment—"Member"—Right of representative of deceased member—Companies Act, 1862, Table A, art. 27.—In 1891 a special resolution of the defendant company was passed and duly confirmed increasing the capital of the company by the creation of new shares, and authorizing the directors to issue such shares. On the 21st of April, 1893, a special resolution of the company was passed that the new shares should be offered for allotment at par to the members of the company who, at the date of the confirmation of the resolution, should be the registered holders of the fully paid-up shares of the company. This resolution was duly confirmed on the 11th of May, 1893. The company was one to which Table A applied.

The plaintiff was the executrix of a member of the company who was living at the date of the special resolution increasing the capital, and was, therefore, by virtue of article 27 of Table A, entitled to the offer of a proportion of the new shares, but who died in 1892—i.e., before the actual issue of the shares pursuant to the special resolution passed in April, 1893. On the 11th of May, 1893, circular letters were addressed to the shareholders calling upon them to state within ten days whether they wished to take the new shares to which they were entitled. One of these letters was addressed to "the executor" of the deceased member at an address which was not the registered address of the deceased member, and the letter never reached the plaintiff.

In May, 1894, the plaintiff became aware of the allotment of the new shares, and applied for the allotment to her of the shares to which the deceased member would have been entitled. The disposal of these shares had been deferred, and they were still in the hands of the company. The deceased member's name was still upon the register of shareholders.

Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to an allotment of the deceased member's proportion of the new shares.—James v. Buena Ventura Nitrate Grounds Syndicate, C.A., 372.

26. Shares—Shares paid up in advance of calls—Payment of interest out of capital on shares so prepaid—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), ss. 14, 38, 101; Table A, clause 7.—By the articles of association of a company the directors were at liberty, as they thought fit, to receive payment from any shareholder of the whole or any part of the amount remaining unpaid on any shares held by him upon such terms in all respects as the directors might determine; and might also, if they thought fit, pay out of the capital of the company interest on sums paid up on shares in advance of calls. Some of the shareholders paid up in full the amounts remaining unpaid on their shares, such payments being payments in advance of calls, under an agreement with the company that they should receive interest at the rate of £6 per cent. per annum on the amount so paid up in advance.

Held, that such articles were perfectly legal and valid, and that the company were entitled to pay the interest on prepaid shares out of capital in the absence of profits.

Dale v. Martin, 9 L. R. Ir. 498, 11 ibid. 371, 31 W. R. Dig. 208, 32 ibid. Dig. 36, approved.—Lock v. Queensland Investment Co., C.A., 257.

27. Shares—Transfer of share—Directors' discretion to refuse—Rectification of register—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 35.—Where the directors have a power to refuse to register transfers of shares, whether the power is general or is a power to refuse for stated reasons, it is for those who allege that the directors have not properly exercised the power to give evidence to that effect.

The directors of a company had power to refuse to register any transfer where they were of opinion that the proposed transferee was not a desirable person to admit to membership.

The directors considered the registration of a proposed transfer, and decided to refuse it, but gave no reasons.

Held (reversing the decision of Kekewich, J.), that the directors had not improperly exercised their power, and that the court could not interfere.—Coalport China Co., Re; Middleton and Bell, Ex parte, C.A., 38.

28. Winding up—Auditor—Duties of—Misfeasance—Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 63) s. 10—Companies Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 76), s. 7, sub-sections 1, 5, 6.—It is no part of an auditor's duty to give advice, either to directors or shareholders, as to what they ought to do, and he is not concerned as to whether the business of the company is prudently or imprudently carried on, or as to whether dividends are properly or improperly declared, provided he discharges his own duty to the shareholders.

The duty of an auditor is to ascertain and state the true financial position of the company at the time of the audit, and, in examining the books of the company for that purpose, to take reasonable care to ascertain that they show the company's true position.

A person whose duty it is to convey information to others does not discharge that duty by simply giving them so much information as is calculated to induce them, or some of them, to ask for more, and an auditor who gives shareholders means of information, instead of information, does so at his peril. The words "the value of the assets as shown in the balance-sheet are dependent on realization," though unusual in an auditor's report, are unimportant, the auditor's duty being to convey in direct and express terms any information which he may think proper to be communicated.—London and General Bank, Re, C.A. 80.

29. Winding up—Auditor—Misfeasance—"Officer" of company—Table A—Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 63), s. 10.—Where the articles of association of a company, so far as they relate to the auditing of accounts, are substantially the same as those contained in Table A, and as the articles relating to audit in In re London and General Bank, 43 W. R. 481, [1895] 2 Ch. 166, the auditor is an "officer of the company" within the meaning of section 10 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890.—Kingston Cotton Mill Co., Re, C.A., 210.

30. Winding-up — Auditors — "Misfeasance" — Directors—Misstatement of value of assets—Payment of dividends out of capital—Reliance on manager's certificate—Auditors' duties—Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 63), s. 10.—An officer of a company who has committed a breach of his duty to the company, the direct consequence of which has been a misapplication of its assets, for which he can be made responsible by an action at law or in equity, is guilty of a "misfeasance" within the meaning of section 10 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890; and in the winding-up of the company the liquidator may have recourse to the summary process provided by that section, and the proper remedy is not to bring an action.

Decision of Vaughan Williams, J. (ante, p. 363), affirmed.

The duty of an auditor of a company is to examine the books, ascertain that they are right, and to prepare a balance-sheet showing the true financial position of the company at the time to which the balance-sheet refers; but he is not an insurer, and in the discharge of his duty he is only bound to exercise a reasonable amount of care and skill, depending upon the circumstance of each particular case. If, however, there is nothing which ought to excite suspicion, less care may properly be considered reasonable than could be so considered if suspicion was or ought to have been aroused.

Re The London and General Bank (ante, p. 80), [1895] 2 Ch. 166, 673, followed.

Decision of Vaughan Williams, J., on this point (ante, p. 363) reversed.—Kingston Cotton Mills Co. (No. 2), Re, C.A.

31. Winding up—Contributory—Underwriting contract—Register of members—Expiration of agent's authority to apply for shares—Ratification of application by subsequent conduct of principal.—An underwriting letter containing an offer by the underwriter, in consideration of a premium, to take up such shares in a company as should not be taken up by the public in answer to an invitation for public subscription, and also the statement that "this engagement is binding on me for two months from this date," was addressed to the promoters of the company. The capital was offered to the public a few days after the date of the underwriting letter, but the underwriting letter was not accepted until a date at which the subscription list had been closed, the invitation to the public proving an almost total failure. The promoters applied for shares in the underwriter's name, and the shares were allotted to him and his name was placed on the register of members of the company, where it remained for more than three years, he acting all that time as a shareholder.

Held, that, whether or not the application for shares was properly made on behalf of the underwriter and accepted in due time, he had by his conduct ratified what had been done, and was liable to pay calls made in the winding up of the company.

Decision of Vaughan Williams, J., ante, p. 397, reversed.—Hemp, Yarn, and Cordage Co., Hindley's case, C.A., 630.

32. Winding up—Debentures—Misfeasance—Property of company—Costs of petition to wind up—Companies (Winding up) Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 63), s. 10.—In the winding up of a company ordered to be wound up by the court, misfeasance proceedings were taken by the official receiver and liquidator which resulted in an order that contribution should be made by certain persons, officers of the company, to the assets of the company, and the liquidator thereby, and also by proceedings to enforce calls against shareholders, realized certain moneys.

The company had issued debentures charging the undertaking and property, whatsoevor and wheresoever, both present and future, of the company, including its uncalled capital for the time being. The assets of the company were insufficient to pay the debenture-holders in full. The winding-up order directed the petitioner's cost to be paid out of the assets of the company, and a claim was made that the costs of the petitioner were payable out of the fund recovered by the liquidator as aforesaid. It was not disputed that the fund in question was included in the debenture-holders' security.

Held, that the petitioner's costs were not payable out of the fund.—Brabourne v. Anglo-Austrian Printing Co., CH.D. VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., 186.

33. Winding up—Lease—Proof by lessor—Creditor—Insolvency of company.—Since the decision in Hardy v. Fothergill, 37 W. R. 177, 13 App. Cas. 351, the earlier case as to proof by a lessor in the case of a company in liquidation have to be reconsidered, and it is the duty of the court to assist a lessor in proving in respect of the obligations of a company as lessee under its lease in all cases where the lessor is desirous of proving at once for his loss on the footing of the lease being determined or treated as determined.

A company which was lessee under an onerous lease went into voluntary liquidation, and the liquidator gave up possession to the lessors, but not so as to surrender the term; the lessors were ready to come to an arrangement by accepting a surrender or determining the lease on being allowed to prove for the loss thereby sustained.

Held, that liberty ought to be given to the liquidator to carry out such arrangement.—Panther Lead Co., Re, CH.D. ROMER, J., 573.

34. Winding up—Mortgage of charges payable quarterly—Mortgage principal and interest in arrear—Proof by mortgagee as unsecured creditor for sum in arrear.—A company mortgaged certain charges entitling the mortgagors to receive certain quarterly payments, and covenanted to pay to the mortgagees on the same quarter days, in discharge of principal and interest under the mortgage, sums equal to those payments; the understanding being that so long as the instalments were regularly paid to the mortgagees the mortgagors should continue to receive the payments under the charges. The payments due under the mortgage having fallen into arrear, and the mortgagors being in course of being wound up,

Held, that the mortgagee was entitled to keep the mortgage as a security for future payments payable thereunder, and to prove in the winding up, as for money had and received, for any payments received by the mortgagors in respect of the mortgaged property after the instalments due under the mortgage ceased to be paid.—Lands Securities Co., Re (No. 2), C.A. 611.

35. Winding up—Official Receiver—Liquidator—Security for costs—Misfeasance summons—Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 63), s. 10.—Where the official receiver and liquidator of a company being wound up compulsorily and only having assets sufficient to pay a small dividend to the debenture-holders takes out a misfeasance summons against officers of the company he is at the mercy of the court as regards costs at the hearing of the summons, and the court has jurisdiction in such a case to order the liquidator personally to pay costs. The court in such a case, in considering whether the liquidator ought or ought not to be ordered to pay the costs personally, will have regard to the fact that an application for an order that he should give security for costs has been made and opposed by the liquidator.—Powell & Sons, Re, CH.D. ROMER, J., 618.

36. Winding up—Practice—Right to inspection of depositions taken under section 115 of the Companies Act, 1862—Companies (Winding-up) Rules, April, 1892, rr. 11, 32.—When a company is being wound up by the court, and an examination has been taken under section 115 of the Companies Act, 1862, every creditor and contributory whose claim or proof has been admitted is entitled under rule 32 of the Companies (Winding-up) Rules, April, 1892, as of right to inspect the file of proceedings and take copies of any documents therein.—Standard Gold Mining Co., Re, CH.D. VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., 63.

37. Winding up—Public examination—Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, s. 8, sub-sections 1, 2, 3, 7.—The words "after consideration of any such report" in sub-section (3) of section 8 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, have reference to the "further report or further reports" mentioned in sub-section (2), and do not refer to the "preliminary report" mentioned in sub-section (1) of that section.

The court has no jurisdiction under sub-section (3) of section 8 to order any person to attend and be publicly examined unless the official receiver has, in addition to the preliminary report mentioned in sub-section (1), made a "further report or further reports" in the terms of sub-section (2) stating matters showing that in his opinion a fraud has been committed by the person sought to be examined.

38. Winding up—Scheme of arrangement—Construction of scheme—Discount, Meaning of.—Expressions in a document addressed to commercial men should be construed in the sense in which ordinary men of business would understand them. Accordingly the words "discount at the rate of 4 per cent." in a scheme of arrangement and compromise with creditors were held to mean discount in the popular sense—viz., a rebate of interest on the amounts.—Lands Securities Co., Re, C.A., 514.

39. Winding up—Set-off—Mutual dealings—Money on deposit—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 38—Judicature Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 77), s. 10.—A company which was being pressed by its creditors deposited certain moneys with a firm of solicitors to settle certain claims, and after the claims had been paid a balance remained in the hands of the solicitors. Shortly afterwards the company passed resolutions for voluntary winding up, which was continued under supervision. No account had been rendered to the company by the solicitors, though they kept an account in their books showing the various receipts and payments, and there was no evidence that the company had in any way consented to any portion of the money being applied to any purpose other than that for which it had been originally deposited with the solicitors. The solicitors claimed to set off a debt for costs against the liquidator's claim in the winding up for the balance.

Held, that there was no set-off.

40. Winding up—Shares—Contract—Rectification of register.—An agreement between the C. and P. Co. provided that the shareholders in the C. Co. should sell their shares to the P. Co. for fully-paid shares therein, and that the contract should be duly filed before the issue of the shares. The shares were issued before the contract was filed; notice of motion to rectify the register was served on the P. Co. Before the hearing the P. Co. was ordered to be wound up.

Held, that the register could only be rectified on terms that provision should be made for the liabilities of the P. Co. between the issue of the shares and the service of notice of motion.—Preservation Syndicate, Re, CH.D. VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.

41. Winding up—Shares—Fully paid-up shares—Certificate—Estoppel—Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), s. 25.—A person who was entitled to have fully paid-up shares in a limited company allotted to himself or his nominees procured fully paid-up shares to be allotted to another person as his nominee, in consideration of a money payment. The money was not paid to the company, but the company issued certificates to the allottee stating that the shares were fully paid up. It appeared that the allottee acted on the faith of the certificate, and believed that cash had been paid to the company for the shares. The liquidator in the winding up of the company sought to make the allottee liable, on the ground that section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, had not been complied with.

Held, that, as against the allottee, the company and the liquidator were estopped from denying that the shares were fully paid up.—Building Estates Brickfields Co., Parbury's case, CH.D. VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., 107.

42. Winding up—Shares—Placing shares—Brokerage—Ultrà vires.—Where brokers are properly employed by the directors in the issue of the capital of of a company, and the payment of a commission per share is a fair and just payment for services rendered, such payment is not ultrà vires on the part of the company.

43. Winding up—Voluntary winding up—Reconstruction—Option of shareholders to take shares in new company—Application by shareholder—Failure of liquidator to procure allotment—Liability in damages —Jurisdiction—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), ss. 98, 133, 138, 151, 161—Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 63), ss. 10, 13—Companies (Winding-up) Rules, 1890, rr. 89, 90.—A scheme for the reconstruction of a company, which was in voluntary liquidation under the supervision of the court, provided that the undertaking should be sold to a new company, and that the shareholders should have the option of taking shares in the new company in proportion to their holding in the old. In accordance with the terms of a circular issued by the liquidator, B., a shareholder in the old company, signed an application for shares in the new company and sent it, with a cheque for the required deposit, to the bankers of the company, who sent him a receipt therefore. The bank subsequently sent to the liquidator, at his request, a list of persons who had applied for shares, but did not include therein the name of B. The liquidator afterwards sold the whole of the shares unapplied for, together with those which should have been allotted to B. He had no assets undistributed in his hands except the proceeds of sale of the shares unapplied for, and he had no shares which he could allot to B. Upon a summons by B. in the winding up.

Held, that the court had no jurisdiction to declare the liquidator liable in damages.—Hill's Waterfall Estate and Gold Mining Co., Re, CH.D. STIRLING, J.

COMPROMISE:—

Consent by counsel — Mistake — Setting aside.—Where, acting upon general instructions for compromise, counsel consents to a compromise under a misapprehension—e.g., intending to concede one thing, inadvertently concedes another, or where counsel on both sides are not ad idem, neither counsel nor client is bound by the compromise, and the court will set it aside.

Holt v. Jesse, 3 Ch. D. 177, approved.

Upon the question of the extent of the authority to compromise given to counsel by his client, the court will not require an affidavit from counsel, but will accept his statement if made from his place at the bar.—Hickman v. Berens, C.A.

CONTEMPT:—

Pending criminal charge — Newspaper comments tending to prejudice trial.—On an application for a writ of attachment for contempt of court by the respondents in respect of certain newspaper articles, it appeared that the applicant had been arrested on a charge of arson, and that the charge had been dismissed; that an article published in the paper while the applicant was under remand referred to the fact that he had been charged with arson, and imputed dishonesty to him. The applicant was afterwards committed for trial for larceny and embezzlement, and the trial was still pending at the date of the application. While he was awaiting trial there were published in the paper an article alluding to the charges pending against the applicant, and a report of the proceedings at a meeting of the standing joint committee of the county, at which the prosecution of the applicant was considered, and ex parte statements made as to that prosecution.

Held, that none of the publications appeared to be intended or calculated to prejudice the pending trial of the applicant, and that no attachment ought to issue.

Principles regulating applications to commit for contempt of court considered.—Reg. v. Payne, Q.B.D., 605.

CONTINGENT REMAINDER.—See POWER, 3.

CONTRACT:—

1. Guarantee—Representations as to credit—Fraud—Mercantile Law Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 60) s. 6—Lord Tenterden's Act (9 Geo. 4), c. 14.—The fact that representations as to the character and credit of another person, made to the intent that he might obtain credit, are made fraudulently, with the intention of obtaining a benefit for the person making such representations, does not take them out of the operation of section 6 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act (Scotland), 1856, which is the same as section 6 of Lord Tenterden's Act, and requires such representations to be in writing.—Clydesdale Bank v. Paton, H.L.

2. Manager—Salary—Arrears of salary—Foreign or English currency—Fall in rate of exchange.—By an agreement entered into in England between the manager of a company carrying on business in Chile and the company it was provided that he should be paid an annual salary, at the rate of £1000 sterling, by monthly payments, "at such place or places and in such manner as he may direct." The manager, while the company was carrying on business, drew bills upon them from time to time for the monthly payments of his salary payable in Chile in Chilian dollars, in an amount of dollars that would at those dates, at the then rate of exchange, be equivalent to the amount of his sterling claim. These drafts were not paid by the company; and on the company subsequently going into liquidation the manager claimed to prove in the liquidation for the amounts of the unpaid instalments calculated in pounds sterling, the rate of exchange having fallen since the dates when the bills were drawn.

Held, that, the company not having paid the manager in the manner in which he "directed" by drawing the bills, his position was that of a person whose salary, at the rate of £1000 per annum, was unpaid; and that he was entitled to prove for his unpaid salary at the sterling rate.—Taltal Chile Nitrate Co., Re, C.A.

3. Option to purchase within limited time—Exercise within time by unauthorized agent—Exercise after time by authorized person—Owner of unsound mind—Ratification.—A. and B. agreed by articles of partnership that if either partner should die the other might purchase the deceased partner's share on certain terms upon giving to his legal representative notice within three months from his death. A. died during the partnership. B. had meanwhile become of unsound mind. Just before the time for the exercise of the option expired C., purporting, but without authority, to act for B., gave notice to purchase A.'s share. Shortly after the time expired B.'s committees, pursuant to an order in lunacy, gave a similar notice.

Held, that neither of the above notices was effectual, and that the doctrine of ratification had no application to such a case.

Bolton v. Lambert, 37 W. R. 434, 41 Ch. D. 295, distinguished.—Dibbins v. Dibbins, CH.D. CHITTY, J., 595.

4. Ratification—Corporation—Contract by agent—No authority under seal—Withdrawal of offer—Specific performance.—Although subsequent ratification may supply the want of authority in an agent at the time of his acceptance of an offer, yet it must be shown in such a case that there was a contract purporting to be made by and with the agent, which, if the agent had authority, would be a valid, binding contract.

The agent of a corporation, having no authority in that behalf from the corporation, entered into a contract to buy land. The vendor afterwards refused to sell. After such refusal the Corporation ratified the contract entered into by their agent; but neither this ratification nor the original contract was under the seal of the Corporation.

An action by the Corporation for specific performance was dismissed.

5. Rescission—Unconscionable bargain—Unclaimed property—Champerty.—The defendant, knowing of unclaimed real estate in the hands of the public trustee in New Zealand, and having ascertained that two ladies were the co-heiresses of the last known owner, induced them, on consideration of his divulging to them particulars of the property, to enter into a written agreement to give him half the property recovered, after payment thereout of costs. There was also a verbal arrangement that the defendant should assist in recovering the property. The co-heiresses were elderly women in humble circumstances and illiterate, and the defendant did not tell them that the property was of considerable value. The written agreement was prepared by the defendant, and the co-heiresses had no solicitor and no independent advice. The title of the co-heiresses was clear, and the property was obtained without litigation on an ex parte application to the public trustee. A portion of the property was divided on the terms of the agreement when the co-heiresses both died. In an action by their executor against the defendant to have the agreement set aside,

Held, (1) that the written agreement was unconscionable, and should be set aside; and that there had been no ratification of it by the co-heiresses as they did not know of their right to have it rescinded; (2) that the contract was also void for champerty by reason of the verbal arrangement as to sharing half the property with the defendant.—Rees v. De Bernardy, CH.D. ROMER, J.

6. Sale—Trover—Wrongful sale by co-owner of shares in a ship—Implied contract of sale.—The plaintiff was the owner of certain shares in a ship. The defendant, who was the managing owner of the ship, being desirous of selling the ship, in a letter addressed to the plaintiff asked her for a bill of sale of her shares. This she refused to give, but subsequently she offered to sell her shares for £100. The defendant, without further communication with her, sold the ship with the consent of all the other co-owners at a price which would have yielded to the plaintiff in respect of her shares a less sum than £100.

Held, that there was an implied contract on the part of the defendant to pay for the shares as upon a contract of sale, and that, though there was no presumption of law that the defendant agreed to pay any price asked, yet, it being found that the price asked was a reasonable one, a presumption arose from the facts of the case that the defendant agreed to pay that price.—Nicol v. Hennessey, Q.B.D., 584.

7. Specific performance — Company — Shares — Assignment — Volunteer — Injunction.—The doctrine that a volunteer cannot hold property, which has been conveyed by way of gift, as against the prior equity of a purchaser for value from the person by whom the conveyance was made, applies to a contract for the sale of shares of a company.—Graham v. O'Connor, CH.D. KEKEWICH, J.

COPYHOLD:—

Heriot—Heriot service—Evidence.—A right to take a heriot as due by heriot service may exist as well in the case of copyhold as in that of freehold tenements of a manor.

Semble, on a question of the right of the lord to take a heriot as due by heriot service presentments of the homage appearing on the court rolls, are not evidence, inasmuch as they relate to a matter of private right in which the other tenants of the manor are not interested.—Western v. Bailey, Q.B.D.

COPYRIGHT:—

1. Dramatic copyright — Adaptation of dramatic piece — Material alterations — "Author" — Dramatic Copyright Act (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 15)—Assignment of provincial rights — Right of assignor to maintain action.—The adaptor of a play who introduces into his version material alterations is an "author of a dramatic piece" within the Dramatic Copyright Act (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 15).

The author of such a dramatic piece, having assigned the provincial rights therein, cannot, without the concurrence of his assignee, maintain an action against an infringer of those rights.—Tree v. Bowkett, CH.D. KEKEWICH, J.

2. Infringement—Injunction—Unpublished information—Right of property in—Contract—Procuring breach of—Damages—Stock Exchange.—Under a contract made between the plaintiffs and the Committee of the London Stock Exchange, valuable information as to the prices of stocks and shares from time to time during the day was collected on the Stock Exchange and supplied to the plaintiffs, and printed on tapes and sheets of letterpress in their office. The defendant, having surreptitiously obtained such information, published it in the same form before its publication by the plaintiffs.

Held, that the plaintiffs had a right of property at common law in the information, and were entitled to an injunction to restrain the defendant from infringing that right by continuing to publish it.

In order to support an action for maliciously inducing persons to break their business contracts with the plaintiff, proof of specific damage need not be given; it is sufficient to prove facts from which it may properly be inferred that some damage must result to the plaintiff from the defendant's wrongful acts.—Exchange Telegraph Co. v. Gregory, C.A.

3. Musical composition—Dramatic piece—Representation—Notice of reservation—Dramatic Copyright Act, 1833 (c. 5), ss. 1, 2—Copyright Act, 1842 (c. 45), ss. 2, 20—Copyright (Musical Compositions) Act, 1882 (c. 40), s. 2—Copyright (Musical Compositions) Act, 1888 (c. 17).—A musical composition must have the characteristics of a dramatic piece in order to come within the Dramatic Copyright Act, 1833. A song that does not require for its representation either dramatic effect or scenery is not a dramatic piece, although it is intended to be sung in appropriate costume on the music-hall stage.

Where a musical composition is published in order to entitle the owner of the right of public representation or performance thereof to sue for penalties for unlicensed performance of such composition, the right of representation or performance must have been reserved by notice printed on every published copy under the Copyright Act, 1882, and this is equally required where the musical composition is also a dramatic piece within the Act of 1833. —Fuller v. Blackpool Winter Gardens Co., Q.B.D.

4. Photograph—Author—"Good and valuable consideration"—"For or on behalf of."—The "author" of a photograph within the meaning of section 1 of the Fine Arts Copyright Act, 1862, is the person who generally controls the operation, and a person who performs the manual operations under his control and direction is not the author.

A portrait taken on the terms that the photographer may sell copies, though without payment by the subject, is made for a "good and valuable consideration" within the proviso in the section; but where it is the intention of the parties that the negative shall be kept by the photographer as his own property, it is not made "for or on behalf of" the subject, and therefore the proviso does not apply.

The words "any other purpose" in section 6 of the Act mean any person other than the author, and consequently include the person photographed. —Melville v. Mirror of Life Co., CH.D. KEKEWICH, J.

5. Photograph—Copy in illustrated paper—Copyright (Works of Art) Act, 1862 (c. 68).—A drawing on a larger scale of an original photograph was reproduced in an illustrated newspaper by the defendants.

Held, that such reproduction was an infringement of the copyright in the original photograph, and that the defendants were liable to an injunction and penalties and damages under the Copyright Act, 1862.—Bolton v. Aldin. Q.B.D.

CORPORATION:—

1. Bye-law—Validity of—Betting—Bye-law prohibiting betting in a street or public place—Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), s. 23.—A bye-law made by a borough council under section 23 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, was in the following terms: "Any person who shall frequent and use any street or other public place within the borough of Wolverhampton, either on behalf of himself or of any other person, for the purposes of bookmaking and betting or wagering, or agreeing to bet or wager, with any person shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding £5."

Held, that the bye-law was not unreasonable; and that a person who frequented and used a street in said borough for the purpose of carrying on the business of betting was liable to be convicted under such bye-law, even though he did not in fact thereby create any obstruction or nuisance.—Burney v. Berry, Q.B.D., 512.

2. Costs—Abandoned application—Officer—Quo warranto—Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (c. 50), s. 225.—A person giving notice of an application for an information in the nature of a quo warranto against the holder of a corporate office, is liable for the costs incurred by the defendant, even though the application be afterwards abandoned.—Ballard v. Halliwell, Q.B.D.

COUNTY COURT:—

1. Appeal—Claim not exceeding £20, but counter-claim exceeding £20—County Courts Act, 1858 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 120.—Where in an action brought in a county court there is a counter-claim for a sum exceeding £20, there is a right to appeal in respect of the counter-claim, notwithstanding the claim itself was for a sum not exceeding £20.—Smith v. Gill, Q.B.D., 574.

2. Costs—Action of tort—Recovery of less than £10—Action which could have been brought in county court—Title to hereditament—Easement—Dispute as to title County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), ss. 56, 60, 116.—The plaintiff, being the owner in fee of land of a greater annual value than £50, claimed a right by way of easement to a flow of water through a pipe lying in the defendant's land, and brought an action in the High Court for an interference with that right. The defendant denied the plaintiff's title, but paid £2 into court, which the plaintiff took out in satisfaction of his cause of action.

Held, that, as the plaintiff could not have succeeded without proving his title to the easement, the action could not have been brought in the county court, and, therefore, the plaintiff was entitled to his costs of the action.—Howarth v. Sutcliffe, C.A., 33.

3. Costs—Administration—Registrar's discretion—County Court Rules, 1889, ord. 50 (a), r. 20.—In the taxation of an administrator's costs in an administration action as between solicitor and client the registrar can take into consideration the fact of the insolvency of the estate, as one of the "other circumstances" referred to in ord. 50 (a), r. 20, of the County Court Rules, 1889.—Pain v. Bowden, Q.B.D.

4. Costs—Fees to counsel—Special allowance where no local bar.—In a taxation of costs in a county court on the higher scale, the special item No. 86 which may be allowed by order of the judge to counsel where there is no local bar in, or within twenty miles of, the court town, can only be allowed once in the same case, although the counsel engaged may have been present in court on more than one occasion.—Atkinson v. Carlisle (Mayor of), Q.B.D.

5. Costs—Remitted action—Costs incurred before and after remittal—Taxation—Right of solicitor to recover—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 118.—Where an action had been remitted for trial to the county court under section 65 of the County Courts Act, 1888, and tried there, and the solicitor for one of the parties delivered his bill of costs to his client, and no application was made within the proper time to tax the costs;

Held, that, in the absence of such an application to tax, section 118 of the Act did not apply so as to prevent the solicitor from recovering on the untaxed bill of costs.

Held, also, that section 118 did not in any way affect the costs incurred in the High Court before the action was remitted.

Boydell v. Millar, 39 W. R. 335, approved.—Cubison v. Mayo, C.A., 473.

6. Interpleader—Auctioneer's commission—Independent claims by different parties in respect of sale of same property—County Court Rules, 1889, ord. 27, r. 13.—The plaintiffs, a firm of auctioneers, sued the defendant in a county court for commission in respect of the sale of a house. Another firm of auctioneers claimed from the defendant a different sum for commission in respect of the same sale of the same house.

Held, that the two claims were not opposing or competing, and could not be made the subject of an interpleader order.—Greatorex v. Shackle, Q.B.D., 47.

7. Jurisdiction—High bailiff—Neglect to levy—Action for negligence—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 49.—Section 49 of the County Courts Act, 1888, provides a remedy in the case of the neglect of the high bailiff to levy execution, but the section does not prevent the high bailiff being liable in such a case to an action for damages for failure to perform his statutory duty in the same manner as the sheriff of a county is liable.—Watson v. White, Q.B.D., 525.

8. Jurisdiction — Proceeding under Charitable Trusts Act, 1853—Title—Rent-charge issuing out of lands—Annual value—Charitable Trusts Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 139), s. 41—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 60.—An action by trustees of a charity to recover arrears of a rent-charge is not a "proceeding" within section 41 of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853.

The plaintiffs sought to recover in the county court arrears of a rent-charge of £10 a year issuing out of lands of an annual value of more than £50.

Held, there was no dispute as to the title of the lands, but only as to the rent-charge, and that the jurisdiction of the county court was not ousted.—Bassano v. Bradley, Q.B.D., 576.

9. Practice—Action against a county court bailiff—Statutory defence—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 54—Special defence, notice of—County Court Rules, 1889, ord. 10, rr. 10, 18*a*.—The defence afforded to county court bailiffs by section 54 of the County Courts Act, 1888, being a statutory defence, notice must be given as provided by the County Court Rules, 1889, ord. 10, rr. 10, 18*a*, if a county court bailiff intends to rely on the section as a defence to an action against him.—Denny v. Bennett, Q.B.D., 333.

10. Practice — Parties — Joinder of plaintiffs—Action under Employers' Liability Act—County Court Rules, 1889, ord. 3, r. 1; ord. 44, rr. 18, 19.—The plaintiffs in an action brought in the county court under the Employers' Liability Act were the personal representatives of fifty deceased miners who were drowned in consequence of the flooding of a mine.

Held, on the authority of Smurthwaite v. Hannay, 43 W. R. 113, [1894] A. C. 494, that, notwithstanding ord. 3, r. 1, and ord. 44, rr. 18, 19, of the County Court Rules, 1889, the plaintiffs, having separate causes of action, could not properly be joined in one action.—Carter v. Rigby, C.A., 566.

11. Remitting action to county court—Lodging writ and order with registrar—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 66.—Where an order is made under section 66 of the County Courts Act, 1888, remitting an action to the county court, the action does not leave the High Court until the plaintiff has lodged the original writ and the order with the registrar of the county court.—D'Errico v. Samuel, C.A., 356

CRIMINAL LAW:—

1. Act of gross indecency with a male person—Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 69), s. 11.—Where two male persons are charged in separate counts of the same indictment with the commission of an act of gross indecency the one with the other, the acquittal of the one is not a bar to the conviction of the other.

It is an offence under section 11 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, for one male person to procure the commission by another male person of an act of gross indecency with himself, the first of such male persons.—Reg. v. Jones, C.C.R., 110.

2. Charge on property to defraud creditors—Bill of sale executed by defendant in pending action—Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), s. 13.—The plaintiff in an action to recover unliquidated damages is not a creditor of the defendant within section 13, sub-section (2), of the Debtors Act, 1869, until he has signed judgment. Therefore the defendant in such an action who before judgment has granted a bill of sale over his property with intent to defeat any judgment which the plaintiff may obtain cannot be convicted under that sub-section of having made a charge on his property with intent to defraud the plaintiff.—Reg. v. Hopkins, C.C.R., 585.

3. Common assault—Jurisdiction of justices to commit for trial—Proceedings not authorized by party aggrieved—Jurisdiction of grand jury to find true bill—24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 46.—An indictment for a common assault may be preferred by a person other than the person aggrieved or someone on his behalf. Where proceedings had been instituted before justices in respect of a common assault without the authority of the person assaulted, and the justices committed the defendant in such proceedings for trial under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 46, and a true bill was found by the grand jury:

Held, that the grand jury had acted within its jurisdiction in finding a true bill, and that the defendant had been rightly put upon his trial pursuant to such finding.—Reg. v. Gaunt, C.C.R.

4. Cruelty to animals—Domestic animal, what is—Tame Seagull—Cruelty to Animals Act, 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 92), ss. 2, 29—Cruelty to Animals Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 60), s. 3.—A seagull had been the property of one A. S. for three years, and was tame. It was kept in a field, with one wing pinioned so that it could not fly, but it could escape by means of a river running through the field. It would come to its owner when called and feed from her hand, and was used by her in her business of a photographer. The respondents were charged on an information with cruelly illtreating the seagull, and were proved to have been guilty of gross cruelty to the bird.

Held, that the seagull was not a "domestic animal" within the meaning of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 92, s. 29, and 17 & 18 Vict. c. 60, s. 3, and that the respondents therefore could not be convicted on the information.—Yates v. Higgins, Q.B.D., 336.

5. Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), s. 11—Public examination of bankrupt—Admissions—Parol evidence—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 17.—At the public examination of a bankrupt under section 17 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, a shorthand writer took down the evidence given by him, and made a transcript of it; the transcript was not read over to or by or signed by the bankrupt, and the public examination was adjourned sine die. The bankrupt was afterwards tried upon an indictment charging him with misdemeanours under section 11 of the Debtors Act, 1869, and at the trial the shorthand writer gave parol evidence of admissions made by the bankrupt at the public examination tending to establish the misdemeanours with which he was charged.

Held, that the evidence was rightly admitted.—Reg. v. Erdheim, C.C.R., 607.

6. Larceny—Delivery of chattel under common mistake — Subsequent fraudulent appropriation by recipient.—The prosecutor, intending to discharge a debt of £2 due by him to the prisoner, handed the prisoner two bank-notes (Irish), both of which were then, alike by the prosecutor and the prisoner, thought to be £1 notes. One of the notes was in fact a £10 note. The prisoner afterwards discovered its true value, and fraudulently appropriated it to his own use.

Held, that the prisoner could not be convicted of larceny.

Reg. v. Ashwell, 34 W. R. 297, 16 Q. B. D. 190, considered.—Reg. v. Hehir, C.C.R. (Ir.).

7. Larceny—Verdict—Absence of finding as to felonious intent—Conviction.—At the trial of a prisoner on an indictment for larceny no evidence (except as to character) was called for the defence. In reply to a question from the presiding judge, the jury said they were not agreed on their verdict. He then asked them if they believed the evidence for the prosecution, and they replied that they did. The judge directed that this statement by the jury amounted to a verdict of guilty, and it was so recorded.

Held, that the effect of the judge's ruling was to supply a finding that the prisoner had a felonious intent; that he had exceeded his functions in so doing; and that the conviction was bad.—Reg. v. Farnborough, C.C.R., 48.

8. Obtaining money by forged instrument—Forged telegram—Forgery Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 98), s. 38.—The prisoner was indicted under section 38 of the Forgery Act, 1861, for obtaining money by means "of a certain forged instrument—to wit, a forged telegram." It appeared that the prisoner, who was a clerk in a post-office, sent to a bookmaker a telegram, by which he offered to bet a sum of money that a certain horse would win a certain race. The telegram purported to have been handed in for transmission before the race was run, and the bookmaker accepted the bet on that footing, and ultimately paid the money. The telegram was in fact sent by the prisoner after the race had been run, and after he had learnt that the horse in question had won.

Held (by Hawkins, Mathew, and Wills, JJ.; Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., and Vaughan Williams, J., doubting), that the telegram was a forged instrument within the meaning of section 38 of the Forgery Act, 1861, and that the indictment was good.—Reg. v. Riley, C.C.R., 318.

9. Rape and indecent assault—Evidence—Particulars of complaint made by prosecutrix—Admissibility.—Upon the trial of a prisoner on a charge of rape or indecent assault or kindred offences against women the particulars of a complaint made by the prosecutrix as soon as possible after the acts complained of may be given in evidence as part of the case of the prosecution for the purpose of enabling the jury to judge whether the conduct of the prosecutrix was consistent with her sworn testimony that the acts complained of were done against her will.—Reg. v. Lillyman, C.C.R., 654.

10. Wounding—Aiding and abetting—Indictment for felonious wounding—Conviction for misdemeanour only—Prevention of Offences Act, 1851 (14 & 15 Vict. c. 19), s. 5—Accessories and Abettors Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 94), s. 8.—Where a prisoner is indicted for felonious wounding, and is convicted only of the misdemeanour of unlawful wounding, a person who is indicted with him for aiding and abetting the felony may be convicted of aiding and abetting the misdemeanour.—Reg. v. Waudby, C.C.R., 64.

CROWN:—

1. Military service—Engagement made with military officer by the Crown—Petition of right.—No engagement made by the Crown with any of its military or naval officers in respect of services either present, past, or future, can be enforced in any court of law.—Mitchell v. Regina, C.A.

2. Prerogative—Servant of the Crown—Civil servant — Contract for personal service — Appointment held during pleasure.—The prerogative of the Crown to dismiss its servants at pleasure applies to all public servants under the Crown, whether military or civil, unless there be some statutory provision for a higher tenure.

Where an authority representing the Crown appoints a person as a servant of the Crown in terms for a certain number of years, there must be taken to be imported into such appointment the right of the Crown to dismiss at pleasure, and no petition of right lies against the Crown in respect of such dismissal.

If any authority representing the Crown were to exclude such right by express stipulation, it would be a violation of public policy, and could not derogate from the power of the Crown.—Dunn v. Regina, C.A., 243.

DAMAGES:—

1. Measure of — Contract — Company — Shares — Option to take—Breach of contract to allot—Sale of assets of company—Purchase-money—Value of shares at date of breach.—Where a company, having agreed to give to certain persons an option or call upon certain of its shares at a specified price per share, extending to a particular date, subsequently and before the expiration of the stipulated period entered into a contract with another company for the sale and transfer of its assets to that company, thereby causing a breach of the contract creating the option, it was Held (reversing Vaughan Williams, J.) that, in estimating the damages, if any, sustained by the option-holders by reason of such breach of contract, the price paid for the assets by the purchasing company ought alone to be taken into account, and not the assets comprised in the contract with that company.

Per Vaughan Williams, J.: The contract creating the option to call upon shares in the company was not illegal or ultra vires either of the company or of the directors.—South African Trust Co., Re, Hirsch, Ex parte, C.A.

2. Measure of—Contract—Sale of goods to be delivered at future time — Repudiation by buyer — Acceptance of repudiation by bringing action—Subsequent re-sale by seller.—By a contract, made on the 24th May 1895, the defendants purchased from the plaintiffs a cargo of maize, to be shipped from a port in the Argentine Republic about the 15th July. The market was then falling, and on the 28th May the buyers repudiated the contract, and on the 24th July the plaintiffs brought this action for damages for non-acceptance of the goods. The prices at that time were falling continuously, and there was no prospect of their recovery. If the plaintiffs had re-sold about the 24th July, when they brought this action, the loss on the contract price of the cargo would have been £1,557, but they did not re-sell until the vessel and cargo arrived at her port of call on the 5th Sept., when the loss was £3,807.

Held, that the measure of damages was the sum of £1,557, being the difference between the contract price and the market price on the 24th July, when the plaintiffs accepted the defendants' repudiation by bringing this action, as, having regard to the falling prices, the plaintiffs ought to have re-sold at that time, and ought not to have waited until the arrival of the cargo on the 5th Sept.—Roth v. Taysen, Q.B.D.

3. Measure of—Master and servant—Sum paid by master to servant for injury—Defect in plant—Warranty—Remoteness.—The plaintiffs, who were stevedores, undertook to unload the defendant's ship. The defendant supplied the necessary chains and other plant. One of the chains was unsound and broke, thereby injuring a workman in the plaintiffs' employ. The workman sued the plaintiffs under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, and the plaintiffs settled the action for an admittedly reasonable sum.

In an action by the plaintiffs to recover that sum from the defendant, it was admitted that the defendant had warranted the chain to be fit for the purpose for which it was to be used, and that there had been a breach of that warranty. It was also admitted that the plaintiffs might, by the exercise of reasonable care, have discovered the defect in the chain.

Held (affirming the judgment of Charles, J., 43 W. R. 528), that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover, as damages for the defendant's breach of warranty, the sum paid by them in settlement of their workman's claim.—Mowbray v. Merryweather, C.A., 49

4. Measure of damages—Trespass—Injury to land—Deposit of spoil on land.—The defendants, who were colliery owners, had committed a trespass on the plaintiffs' land by depositing spoil thereon from their colliery for a number of years. Further tipping having been restrained by injunction, and an inquiry as to damages having been directed,

Held, that the true measure of damages was the value of the land to the trespasser for the purposes for which he had used it.

The principle of the wayleave cases—Jegon v. Vivian, 19 W. R. 365, L. R. 6 Ch. 742; Livingstone v. Rawyards Coal Co., 28 W. R. 357, 5 App. Cas. 25; and Phillips v. Homfray, L. R. 6 Ch. 770, 20 W. R. Dig. 121—applied.

Decision of Chitty, J. (ante, p. 459), affirmed.—Whitwham v. Westminster Brymbo Coke and Coal Co., C.A., 698.

Trover—Finding of goods—Title of finder—Rings found in pool—Title of owner of pool as against finder.—Where an owner of land has a de facto possession of the land and an actual control over the same, a chattel found upon or beneath such land is presumed to be in the possession of the owner of the land, who can claim possession of the chattel from the finder.—South Staffordshire Waterworks Co. v. Sharman, Q.B.D., 653.

DIVORCE:—

1. Adultery — Conduct conducing to adultery—Verdict of jury—Discretion—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), s. 31.—On a petition by a husband for the dissolution of his marriage, adultery by the wife was admitted, but the jury found that the petitioner had been guilty of "wilful neglect or misconduct conducing to the adultery" within the meaning of section 31 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857.

It appeared that the parties were domestic servants. The respondent had had an illegitimate child by the petitioner before the marriage. During their married life, between 1883 and 1894, the petitioner was abroad for long periods with his master; and the respondent meanwhile kept a lodging-house, the petitioner remitting to her regularly an adequate weekly allowance. The parties lived unhappily owing to the enforced separation. In 1894 a child was born, the result, as the respondent admitted, of the adultery imputed to her in the petition.

The court, notwithstanding the verdict of the jury, pronounced a decree nisi for the dissolution of the marriage, but directed that it should not be made absolute until the petitioner had secured to the respondent, by a proper deed, the annual sum of £20, payable in equal monthly instalments, commencing from the date of the decree nisi, during their joint lives, dum sola et casta vixerit.—Parry v. Parry, P.D. & AD.D.

2. Alimony—Increase—Husband relieved of obligation to support children.—If the husband is relieved of the obligation of supporting his children by reason of the custody of the children being given to the wife, his faculties are thereby increased, and the court can increase the permanent alimony already given the wife.—Halligan v. Halligan, C.A. (Ir.).

3. Alimony, Permanent—Dissolution of marriage—Practice—Injunction—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), s. 32.—Where a wife having obtained a decree nisi for the dissolution of her marriage, an order had been made pursuant to section 32 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, that the husband should secure a sum for her maintenance, and that, for that purpose, it should be referred to one of the conveyancing counsel of the Chancery Division to draw a deed, the court granted an injunction restraining the husband, his servants and agents, from dealing with certain of his property until the execution of the deed.—Newton v. Newton, P.D. & AD.D.

4. Cruelty—Husband charged by wife with committing an unnatural offence—Charge persisted in after verdict of jury acquitting husband—Restitution of conjugal rights—Judicial separation—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. 68) s. 5.—Per Lindley and Lopes, L.JJ.—To constitute legal cruelty there must be danger to life, limb, or health bodily or mental, or a reasonable apprehension of it.

Per Rigby, L.J.—There may be exceptional cases in which, without bodily injury or threat of it, the injury to mental feelings may be legal cruelty.

Where a wife persisted in charging her husband with having committed an unnatural offence of which he had been acquitted by the verdict of a jury,

Held (Rigby, L.J., dissenting), that such conduct on the part of the wife did not amount to legal cruelty, and formed no ground for granting the husband a decree of judicial separation; but

Held also (by Lindley, Lopes, and Rigby, L.JJ.), that the wife's conduct disentitled her to a decree for restitution of conjugal rights, inasmuch as, since the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1884, the court, by necessary implication, had power to refuse a decree for restitution wherever the result will be to compel the court to treat one of the spouses as deserting the other without reasonable cause, contrary to the real truth of the case.—Russell v. Russell, C.A., 213.

5. Desertion—Restitution of conjugal rights—Conduct of petitioner—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1884 (c. 68), s. 5.—In a suit for restitution of conjugal rights, brought by a second wife, it appeared that differences had arisen between her and her husband, due to her inability to agree with her step-children, his daughters by the former marriage, and that she had in consequence left her home, and her husband had refused to receive her back.

Held, on consideration of the evidence, that the wife had done nothing to disentitle her to maintain a suit for desertion without reasonable cause, within the meaning of section 5 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1884, as interpreted by the Court of Appeal in Russell v. Russell (ante, p. 213, [1895] P. 315), and that she was therefore entitled to a decree for restitution of conjugal rights.—Oldroyd v. Oldroyd, P.D. & AD.D.

6. Judicial separation—Alimony pendente lite—Application for injunction.—Where in a suit for judicial separation the wife obtained an order for alimony pendente lite, the court refused to grant an injunction restraining the husband from parting with his property.—Carter v. Carter, P.D. & AD.D., 400.

7. Judicial separation—Desertion—Limitation of time for proceedings—Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. c. 39), s. 4—11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, s. 11.—For the purpose of proceedings under section 4 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, the desertion of a married woman by her husband is a continuing act; an application by the wife for an order under that section need not, therefore, be made within six months of the commencement of the desertion.—Heard v. Heard, P.D. & AD.D.

8. Judicial separation—Justices—Jurisdiction—Aggravated assault.—Where a separation order containing only a provision for the custody of children has been made by justices, there is no jurisdiction to make a subsequent order for maintenance.—Woodhead v. Woodhead, P.D. & AD.D.

9. Judicial separation—Justices—Maintenance—Neglect to provide—Evidence of means—Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. c. 39), s. 4—Appeal—Costs of wife when unsuccessful respondent.—Upon the hearing by a court of summary jurisdiction of a summons taken out by a married woman under section 4 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, charging her husband with wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for her, the court, before making an order, must be satisfied that the husband either is in receipt of actual earnings, or has the capability of earning a livelihood; evidence of means cannot be entirely dispensed with.

Where a married woman is an unsuccessful respondent in an appeal to the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, the court, without laying down any binding rule of practice, will in ordinary cases follow the practice in matrimonial causes, and order her costs of the appeal to be paid by the husband.—Earnshaw v. Earnshaw, P.D. & AD.D.

10. Judicial separation — Justices — Persistent cruelty—Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895 (c. 39), s. 4.—The words "whose husband shall have been guilty of persistent cruelty" in section 4 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, are retrospective, and the cruelty relied on may be before the commencement of the Act.—Lane v. Lane, P.D. & AD.D.

11. Judicial Separation — Justices — Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895—Appeal—Findings of fact and of law—Notes in court below—Costs of notes of evidence and of grounds of decision.—Upon appeals under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, the Divisional Court will not reverse a finding of fact, unless it be shown that the court of summary jurisdiction was clearly wrong in the conclusion at which it arrived.

In administering the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, courts of summary jurisdiction should be careful not to interfere too much in matrimonial life.

Magistrates' clerks should take notes of the evidence and of the grounds upon which decisions are based, and the costs of such notes will be allowed in the costs of appeals under the Act.—Harling v. Harling, P.D. & AD.D.

12. Maintenance — Alienability — Matrimonial Causes Act, 1866 (29 & 30 Vict. c. 32), s. 1.—Maintenance granted to a divorced wife under section 1 of 29 & 30 Vict. c. 32, cannot be prospectively released or assigned.—Watkins v. Watkins, C.A., 677.

13. Nullity—Duress.—On the trial of a petition for a declaration of nullity of marriage, on the ground of duress, the following facts appeared. The petitioner, a girl of seventeen, went through the ceremony of marriage with the respondent in a church on the 5th of June, 1889. He was a friend of her brother's. She had met him only a few times, and he had never spoken to her of marriage, or professed affection for her. She stated that on the day in question her mother told her that they were going for a drive, and that they drove to the church, where they found the respondent; that she thought she was being betrothed to him, and would not have submitted even to that if she had not been so much under her mother's influence, that she did what she was told; that, on leaving the church, she threw away the ring; that she had never seen the respondent since; and that none of her family then knew what had happened except her mother, who died in 1890. A few days before, the respondent had obtained a marriage licence, falsely stating in his affidavit that the petitioner's father consented to the marriage. On the 5th of June he sailed for South Africa with the petitioner's brother, and on their arrival told him of the marriage. Her brother returned in 1889, but did not mention the matter to any member of his family except his mother, who told him to say nothing about it. In 1893 the petitioner went through the ceremony of marriage with another man. In the same year the respondent wrote to her father from South Africa, claiming her as his wife.

The court, upon consideration of the evidence, found that the petitioner had never consented to marry the respondent, but had gone through the ceremony as one of betrothal, and in doing so had been to such an extent under the influence of her mother and the respondent that she was not a free agent, and granted a decree nisi of nullity.—Ford v. Stier, P.D. & AD.D.

14. Nullity—Fraud and duress.—Petitioner was induced by her mother, acting in concert with respondent, to go through the marriage ceremony with respondent; the petitioner being persuaded by her mother that it was only a betrothal ceremony:

Held, entitled to a decree of nullity.—Clarke v. Clarke, P.D. & AD.D.

15. Practice—Co-respondent—Necessity for making a person co-respondent—Inability to prove adultery—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), ss. 28, 33.—Where the relief sought by the petitioner is on the ground of adultery alleged to have been committed with a man, who is alive, and whose name and identity are known, the petitioner must make that person a co-respondent; and the court ought not to excuse him from so doing merely because he finds that he cannot obtain evidence which will prove his case as against that co-respondent.—Jones v. Jones, P.D. & AD.D.

16. Practice—Co-respondent—Substituted service—Necessity of affidavit by petitioner—Rules of 1865, rr. 10, 11, 12, 13.—On an application to allow substituted service of a petition on a co-respondent, there should be an affidavit by the petitioner.—Williams v. Williams, P.D. & AD.D.

17. Practice—Costs—Agreement for settlement of action—Costs of preparation and execution of separation deed.—In an action for judicial separation the parties mutually agreed to a separation by deed and to the settlement of the action, the respondent paying the petitioner's costs of suit, and the terms of the agreement being made a rule of court.

Held, that the costs of settling the deed were not costs of suit, but might have been provided for in the agreement; as they were, however, not provided for, the court had no jurisdiction over them.—Lancaster v. Lancaster, C.A., 440.

18. Practice—Costs—Solicitor—Pauper—Petition by husband suing in formâ pauperis—Divorce Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), s. 51.—Section 51 of the Divorce Act, 1857, gives the court a discretion as to costs. The best exercise of such discretion, except under special circumstances, is to follow the rule laid down in Carson v. Pickersgill & Sons, 33 W. R. 589, 14 Q. B. D. 859, and to allow a husband suing in formâ pauperis, or his solicitor, only out-of-pocket expenses, including a reasonable sum for office expenses, against the co-respondent.

The adoption of such rule is intended to introduce a new uniform rule into all the divisions of the High Court.—Richardson v. Richardson, C.A., 102.

19. Practice—Evidence—Decree in previous suit.—On a petition by a wife for dissolution of her marriage on the ground of adultery coupled with desertion, the decree in a previous suit in which her husband had been co-respondent was produced. This decree stated that the jury found that the respondent had been guilty of adultery with the co-respondent, and that he had been condemned in costs, but contained no finding by the jury that the co-respondent had been guilty of adultery with the respondent:

Held, that the decree was not by itself sufficient evidence of adultery against the husband.—Ruck v. Ruck, P.D. & AD.D.

20. Practice—Evidence—Identification—Use of photographs.—In matrimonial cases, except under very special circumstances, the court will not act upon identification by a photograph only.—Frith v. Frith, P.D. & AD.D.

21. Practice—Evidence—Judge's note of evidence—Admissibility—Divorce bill—Substituted service—Deceased witness.—A certified copy of the judge's notes of the evidence of a witness called by the petitioner at the hearing of a petition for divorce a mensâ et thoro cannot, in case of the death of the witness, be received as proof of the matters deposed to by him upon the second reading of a bill for divorce presented by the petitioner.—Griffin's Divorce Bill, Re, H.L.

22. Practice—Evidence—Motion to dispense with co-respondent—Confirmation.—On a motion to dispense with co-respondents, the affidavit of the petitioner alone is not sufficient; such affidavit must be confirmed by further evidence.—Barber v. Barber, P.D. & AD.D.

23. Practice—Sequestration—Right of sequestrators—Money held by third person, not party to the action—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), s. 52.—The right of sequestrators to attach moneys, alleged to be held by third persons for the judgment debtor, but denied by them to be so held, cannot be determined upon a motion in a suit to which the third persons are not parties, unless they appear and submit to the jurisdiction of the court.

A co-respondent in a divorce suit not having paid the damages assessed against him by the jury, a writ of sequestration was issued against his property, in pursuance of which the sequestrators applied by a motion in the suit for an order calling upon the trustees of his marriage settlement to pay into court any moneys in their hands belonging to him. The trustees disputed their liability to the co-respondent, and the jurisdiction of the court to make the order:

Held, that, as the trustees were not parties to the suit, and disputed their liability to the co-respondent, and the jurisdiction of the court, the court had no power to make the order on motion in the suit.—Craig v. Craig, P.D. & AD.D.

24. Queen's Proctor—Intervention—Unreasonable delay in presenting petition—Questions for jury—Divorce Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), s. 31.—In a suit by a husband for a dissolution of marriage, if the Queen's Proctor intervenes on the ground of unreasonable delay in presenting the petition,

Held, that the proper questions to be put to the jury are—(1) When did the petitioner first know or have reason to believe that his wife had committed adultery? (2) when did the petitioner first take action to obtain a divorce?.—Brougham v. Brougham, P.D. & AD.D.

25. Variation of settlements—Acceleration of infant's interest by divorce of parents—Powers of petitioner.—Upon a petition to vary two post-nuptial settlements after decree absolute for divorce, it appeared that the whole property was in land, and that, if the respondent's interests were extinguished, the petitioner would, by virtue of a clause in one of the settlements, have power to call upon the trustees to raise forthwith a sum which, at the present time, would exceed the sale value of the whole of the settled property, and which would, therefore, if exercised by the petitioner, absolutely blot out all interests of the infant child of the parties under the settlements. The registrar, notwithstanding this, recommended that the respondent's interests should be extinguished as if he were dead.

Held, that, inasmuch as the child's interest was accelerated by the extinguishment of the respondent's interests, the child was thereby obtaining a certain gain against an uncertain loss if the petitioner should now exercise the power conferred upon her by the settlement

Report of the registrar confirmed.—Creagh v. Creagh, P.D. & AD.D.

26. Variation of marriage settlements — Consent order — Mistake — Amendment of original order — Subsequent circumstances—Further references—Order —Costs out of settled fund.—The court, upon the application of the testamentary guardians of an infant child of the marriage of the petitioner and respondent, directed, after various references to the registrar, that an order, made by Butt, J., in 1886, upon the consent of the petitioner, respondent, and trustees of the marriage settlement, be amended by extinguishing the respondent's interest in a portion of the settled funds; and further directed that the costs of all parties be paid out of the said portion of the trust funds or the income thereof.—Arkwright v. Arkwright, P.D. & AD.D.

27. Variation of settlements—Death of petitioner—Application to make executor party—Divorce Act, 1859 (c. 61), s. 5—Divorce Act, 1878 (c. 19), s. 3.—The Divorce Court has no power, either under section 5 of the Act of 1859 or section 3 of the Act of 1878, to order the executor of a deceased husband petitioner to be made a party for the purposes of continuing proceedings for variation of settlement. —Thomson v. Thomson, C.A.

28. Variation of settlements—No means, except income from settled property—Costs directed to be paid out of corpus of settled property—22 & 23 Vict. c. 61, s. 5.—The petitioner, a widow with one child by her first husband, settled, upon her second marriage, certain property, producing an annual income of about £750, upon trust to pay the income to herself for her life; then to her husband, the respondent, for his life, and, in the events which happened, with remainder to her said only child, if he should attain twenty-one, with ultimate remainder to the petitioner. The petitioner obtained a decree absolute dissolving her marriage, and, in her petition to vary the settlement, she prayed that the respondent's life interest in the trust funds should be extinguished; and, further, that the trustees should be ordered to pay to her a sum of £1,000, or such other sum as the court should direct, to cover the costs and other incidental and additional expenses of the petitioner, arising out of the respondent's misconduct. The registrar reported in favour of the first, but submitted, in regard to the second, part of the prayer, that, as it would be to some extent prejudicial to the child's interests, no order ought to be made directing any payment out of the corpus of the fund until the infant was represented. Upon motion to vary the registrar's report, the court ordered an adjournment, so that the infant might be represented, and thereupon made an order extinguishing the respondent's interests, and directing the trustees to raise and pay to the petitioner a sum of £450 to cover costs, including the costs of this application.—Douglas v. Douglas, P.D. & AD.D.

DOG:—

1. Animal—Negligence—Negligently keeping a ferocious dog—Scienter—Disposition to bite mankind. —Where a claim is made for injuries caused by a dog to a human being, the evidence of scienter must show not only that the dog had a ferocious disposition, but that it had a ferocious disposition against mankind. Proof, therefore, that the dog had worried a goat was not sufficient evidence of scienter to make the defendant liable.—Osborne v. Chocqueel, Q.B.D., 575.

2. Innkeeper—Liability of innkeeper for injuries caused by a dog—28 & 29 Vict. c. 60.—An innkeeper is, by reason of section 2 of 28 & 29 Vict. c. 60, deemed to be the owner of a dog living in his hotel, and is liable for injuries to cattle caused by it, notwithstanding the dog was at the time of the injuries complained of under the control of a person staying at the hotel, to whose care it had been committed by the real owner.—Gardner v. Hunt, Q.B D., 527.

DONATIO MORTIS CAUSÂ:—

1. Antecedent delivery—Change in character of possession.—A person, not in contemplation of death, gave a deposit note to her mother to take care of for her. Some time afterwards, the note having remained all the time in the mother's possession, the donor, who was then in contemplation of death, and died a few days afterwards, gave the note absolutely to the mother in case she, the donor, should not recover.

Held, that this latter gift, by changing the character in which the mother already held possession of the note, was a sufficient delivery for the purpose of an effective donatio mortis causâ.—Cain v. Moon, Q.B.D.

2. Deposit receipt—Unendorsed.—A deposit receipt unendorsed is a good subject matter of donatio mortis causâ.

3. Deposit receipt—Suicide contemplated—Public policy.—The owner of a deposit receipt gave the document to her sister, the donor at the time of the gift contemplating suicide and intending the gift to take effect only in that event. The donor did commit suicide.

Held, that the gift under such circumstances did not constitute a valid donatio mortis causâ.—Agnew v. Belfast Banking Co., C.A. (Ir.).

EASEMENT:—

Prescription—User—Presumption in law of lost grant.—S. was the owner and occupier of three locks on a certain river, and certain navigation and other rights on the same river. The G. Corporation had for many years exercised the right to open the lock-gates in all times of flood, without opposition from S.'s predecessors in title. S. brought an action to restrain the defendants from exercising any such right. The G. Corporation, as owners of the adjoining lands at this part of the river, claimed an easement to open the gates, or, alternatively, the presumption of a lost grant.

Held, that a valid easement had been created in favour of the G. Corporation, and that such could be supported by the presumption of a lost grant.—Simpson v. Godmanchester (Mayor of), C.A., 149.

ECCLESIASTICAL LAW:—

1. Benefice—Augmentation by bishop—Charge on lands—Arrears—Release of part of lands—Tenant of residue—Liability—29 Car. 2, c. 8.—An augmentation having been granted under the Acts, 29 Car. 2, c. 8, and 1 & 2 Wm. 4, c. 45, and charged on certain lands, a portion of such lands was acquired by the predecessors of the defendant, who was tenant for life in possession, under a contract whereby they released the residue of the lands from the burden of the charge and indemnified the owners against it.

An action was brought to recover arrears of the augmentation from the defendant.

Held, that the defendant was liable for the whole amount of the charge, notwithstanding the fact that the annual profits of his lands fell short of the amount of the charge.—Pertwee v. Townsend, Q.B.D.

2. Clergy Discipline Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 32), ss. 2, 12—Clergy Discipline Act, 1892, Procedure Rules, r. 34—Simony—False declaration under Clerical Subscription Act, 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 122)—Meaning of "offence against morality not being a question of doctrine or ritual."—The 2nd section of the Clergy Discipline Act, 1892, provides, inter alia, that if a clergyman is alleged to have been guilty of any immoral act, immoral conduct, or immoral habit, or of any offence against the laws ecclesiastical, being an offence against morality and not being a question of doctrine or ritual, he may be prosecuted by any person approved by the bishop, and tried in the Consistory Court of the diocese in which he holds preferment; and by the 34th rule of the Procedure Rules made under the Act, a clergyman holding no preferment may be prosecuted under the Act in the Consistory Court of the diocese in which he resides.

The complaint in a criminal suit lodged in the registry of the Consistory Court of London at the instance of a person approved by the bishop, charged the defendant, a clergyman resident in the diocese, with having been guilty of offences against the laws ecclesiastical, being offences against morality and not being a question of doctrine or ritual, by having within the five years last past, and within the diocese, been guilty of simony, and knowingly made a false declaration against simony under the Clerical Subscription Act, 1865. The defendant brought in an answer denying that the offences alleged in the complaint were offences against the laws ecclesiastical, being offences against morality within the meaning of the 2nd section of the Clergy Discipline Act, 1892, and at the hearing of the issues of law raised on the pleadings, contended that the Consistory Court of London had no jurisdiction to entertain the suit.

Held, by the Ordinary, that the Consistory Court of London had jurisdiction in the suit under the Clergy Discipline Act, 1892.—Lee v. Flack, P.D. & AD.D.

3. Faculty—Exclusive right to use of pathway across closed churchyard—Construction of faculty—Refusal to grant subsequent faculty derogating from previous grant—Ecclesiastical Leasing Acts, 1842 and 1858 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 108; 21 & 22 Vict. c. 57)—Practice—Refusal of Appellate Court to interfere with discretion of ordinary.—In 1891 a faculty issued from the registry of the Consistory Court of London authorizing the rector and churchwardens of a parish in the City of London, in conjunction with a company owning premises abutting on the churchyard of the parish—a churchyard closed for burials under Order in Council—to make a pathway enclosed on the sides by railings, across the churchyard from the company's premises to a public thoroughfare on the opposite side of the churchyard, provided a specified rent was paid to the rector and his successors during a term of years. The faculty recited an agreement between the rector and churchwardens and the company whereby the former agreed to concur in granting to the company a right of way over the pathway afterwards authorized by the faculty for the term, and on payment of the rent there mentioned: all the works to be done at the company's costs, and "such right of footway to be for themselves their tenants and any others authorized by them in common with the rector and churchwardens and any others authorized by the rector and churchwardens." In 1892, after the company had done and paid for the works and whilst the term of years was still unexpired, the rector and churchwardens agreed with other owners of premises abutting on the churchyard adjacent to the company's premises to concur in granting to such owners a right of footway over the pathway made under the faculty of 1891, subject to the rights of the company, and also over a new footpath to be made over a piece of the churchyard to join the footpath so already made, and petitioned the Consistory Court of London for a faculty to make a new footpath and to remove a portion of the above-mentioned railings; the owners of the premises desiring the right of way over the two footpaths intervening in support of the petition:

Held, by the Consistory Court of London, that the faculty asked for must be refused, as the faculty of 1891 had granted to the company and their assigns the enjoyment for a term of years not yet expired of the pathway made under that faculty to the exclusion of the other occupiers of premises abutting on the churchyard, and the Ordinary ought not to sanction by faculty anything being done in derogation of the exclusive right so granted:

Held, further, by the same court, that the operation of the Ecclesiastical Leasing Acts of 1842 and 1858 is confined to glebe lands and property of that description, and does not extend to enable the incumbent of a parish, with the consent of the patron of the living and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, to grant leases of or rights over all or any portion of the churchyard of the parish.

Held, on appeal by the Arches Court of Canterbury, that the construction put on that faculty by the court below was correct, and, the grant or refusal of the faculty prayed being in the discretion of the Ordinary, by whom that discretion had been properly exercised, the Appellate Court ought not to interfere, and the appeal must be dismissed.

Observations by the Chancellor of the Diocese of London as to the practice of the Consistory Court of London on the grant of faculties for the formation and use of private pathways across churchyards closed for burials, and as to the provisoes to be inserted in such faculties.—St. Gabriel, Fenchurch-street (Rector) v. City of London Real Property Co., P.D. & AD.D.

4. Monition—Jurisdiction—Criminal suit promoted by churchwardens against lay rector to compel repair of chancel.—The articles in a criminal suit promoted by the churchwardens of a parish against the lay rector of a parish church, charged that the chancel of the church was in a very dilapidated condition, and that the respondent, though legally bound to repair it, had for four years refused and neglected to do so. On the respondent giving an affirmative issue to the articles and submitting to judgment, the Ordinary pronounced that the respondent had offended against the ecclesiastical law, and admonished him to do the repairs required.—Morley v. Leacroft, P.D. & AD.D.

ELECTION LAW:—

1. County council—No election on appointed day—Mandamus—Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), s. 70.—Under section 70 (2) of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (which is incorporated in the Local Government Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41), by section 75 of that Act) an order for a peremptory mandamus to the returning officer to hold an election will issue in the first instance on the ex parte application of a duly qualified elector. —West Sussex County Council, Re, Q.B.D.

2. Parliament — Election petition — Corrupt and illegal practices — Particulars of charges — Offences committed after the date of petition.—In an election petition alleging certain specific offences and "other corrupt and illegal practices before, during, and after the election," the petitioner cannot, unless the petition be duly amended, include in his particulars or give evidence of offences alleged to have been committed subsequent to the date of the presentation of the petition.—Cremer v. Lowles; Haggerston Election Petition, Re, C.A., 629.

3. Registration—Parliament—Franchise—Adjudication upon claims and objections—Closing the lists—6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, s. 41.—A revising barrister gave notice that his court would be held on two successive days, and that the lists would be closed at the conclusion of the sitting on the second day. On the evening of the second day, having satisfied himself that there were no more claimants or persons objected to present who were desirous of being heard, he declared the lists closed. On the following day the revising barrister sat in court to read the lists and to initial names inserted or expunged. Whilst this was being done a person applied to be heard in support of his claim to be on the list

Held, that the lists having been declared closed, the applicant had no right to be heard in support of his claim.—Reg. v. Soden, C.A., 449.

4. Registration—Parliament—Franchise—Notice of objection — Omission — Mistake — Amendment.—The omission of merely formal matter in a notice of objection to a voter when such omission arises through a mistake, and is not of such a nature as to make it likely to mislead or cause hardship, may, and should, be amended by the revising barrister.

B. served notice of objection to A., whose name was on the list of voters for the parish of St. S. in the parliamentary borough of E. The notice set out the number of A. on the list and the grounds of objection, but omitted to state the parish in the list of which A.'s name appeared, contrary to the form given in the Registration Order, 1895. There were twenty-seven parishes in the borough of E. The revising barrister held that the omission rendered the notice bad, but having found as a fact that it arose through a mistake, and had misled no one and causes no hardship, he amended it and caused no hardship, he amended it and allowed the objection.

Held, that the revising barrister was right.

5. Registration—Parliamentary franchise—Occupation elector—Claim for vote in borough—Description of qualification—Two dwelling-houses—Omission in claim of the word "successive"—Power to amend—Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 26), ss. 24, 28 (13)—Registration Order, 1895, Schedule 3, Part I., paragraph 17 (b).—A notice of claim to have claimant's name inserted in the list of occupation electors for a borough was in the following terms:—"(third column) Nature of qualification—Dwelling-house; (fourth column) Description of qualifying property—69, Richmond-road; 3, Hamilton-square." The claimant had in fact occupied during the qualifying period in immediate succession the two houses set out in the fourth column. The claim was objected to on the grounds, first, that it was not a claim for successive occupation, the word "successive" not being inserted in the third column; and, secondly, that the revising barrister had no power to amend the claim by inserting the word "successive." The barrister overruled the objections, and amended and allowed the claim.

Held, (1) (Vaughan Williams, J., dubitante) that the notice of claim, on the reasonable construction of its terms, must be taken to be a claim for successive occupation; (2) that having regard, however, to the Registration Order, 1895, Schedule 3, Part I., paragraph 17 (i) (b), the qualification was not sufficiently described in the claim, which ought to have contained the word "(successive)" in the third column; and (3) that the barrister had power under section 28, sub-section (13), of the Registration Act, 1878, to amend the claim by inserting therein the word "(successive)."

Quære, whether there is any power to amend a claim which, on the reasonable construction of its terms, is equivocal.

6. Registration—Parliament—Service franchise—Part of a house — Cubicle — Separate occupation — Occupation as a dwelling—Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 26), s. 5 —Representation of the People Act, 1884 (48 Vict. c. 3), s. 3.—A police constable had the exclusive occupation of a cubicle in a police station. The cubicle was one of a number contained in one room. It was separated off from the rest of the room by a partition seven feet high not reaching to the ceiling, and was entered by a door opening into a passage which passed down the room. The cubicles had air, light, and warmth in common. The whole building was under the control of the chief constable, who could order any constable to change his cubicle at any time. The constable slept in the cubicle, but could not without leave take his meals there or smoke there, or go into it during the day time. He had the key of the door, but he was bound to let the inspector in at any time, and he could be ordered to give up the key.

Held, by the Court of Appeal (Rigby, L.J., dissenting), that the cubicle was not separately occupied by the constable as a dwelling within section 5 of the Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act, 1878.

ESCHEAT.—See INTESTATES ESTATES ACTS, 2.

ESTOPPEL:—

1. Contract of indemnity—Evidence as to abandonment of claim.—The plaintiff and defendant jointly guaranteed to a bank payment of a certain cash bond, the plaintiff agreeing with the defendant to indemnify him from all liability thereunder. Seven years afterwards the bank released the guarantors from liability on payment by each of £1,000.

In a suit by the plaintiff to declare the agreement of indemnity discharged, and to restrain the defendant from continuing his action thereon,

Held, that in the absence of a contract to discharge it, the defendant could not be estopped from enforcing it by any representation, express or implied, of his intention to abandon it. To raise an equity on behalf of the plaintiff there must have been misrepresentation of existing facts.

2. Judgment—Privies in estate—Fishery in non-tidal waters.—A judgment inter partes is an estoppel against privies in estate only when the estate has been acquired by the person sought to be estopped subsequent to the date of the judgment.

A claim by an individual to a several fishery in non-tidal waters is not a question of public interest on which a judgment which does not work an estoppel is admissible against strangers. — De Burgho's Estate, Re, CH.D. (Ir.)

EXECUTOR:—

1. Devisee—Fixtures—Tapestry.—Tapestry on the walls of a room in a family mansion, which was called the "Tapestry Room," had about a century ago been affixed to the walls of the room in a manner that skilled witnesses said would now be used if it was required to fix tapestry permanently. The mansion-house had been settled by the will of a former owner in strict settlement, but the will made no mention of the tapestry. The tapestry was claimed as a chattel by the residuary legatee of the will as against the devisee of the mansion-house.

Held, that as regards fixtures a claim by an executor against a devisee was on the same footing as a claim by an executor against an heir; that on the evidence in this case the tapestry was a fixture and passed under the devise of the mansion; and that the case fell within the principle of the decisions relating to claims to fixtures as between executor and heir, and was covered by the decision in D'Eyncourt v. Gregory, 15 W. R. 186, L. R. 3 Eq. 382.—Norton v. Dashwood, CH.D. CHITTY, J., 680.

2. Executor and residuary legatee—Equitable charge of assets by executor or legatee—Creditor of testator—Notice—Priority—Right to follow assets.—Where an executor, who is also residuary legatee, by a legal or equitable assignment and for valuable consideration transfers assets to a person who has no notice of the existence of unsatisfied debts of the testator, or of circumstances rendering such conduct on the part of such executor improper, and such transferee has given proper notice of his charge, such assignment will hold good against the unsatisfied creditors of the testator.—Graham v. Drummond, CH.D. ROMER, J., 596.

3. Legacy — Appropriation. — An executor may appropriate specific shares to a legatee, and even to himself if he is a legatee; and it is not necessary to the validity of such an appropriation that a proportionate amount of the specific shares should at the same time be appropriated to the other legatees. —Richardson, Re, Morgan v. Richardson, CH.D. NORTH, J., 279.

4. Retainer—Principal—Surety.—A testator mortgaged a reversionary interest as surety for his son, and died bequeathing a share of the residue of his estate to this son. After the testator's death the son became a bankrupt (in 1859) and never obtained his discharge. Neither the executors nor mortgagees proved in the bankruptcy. Certain payments were made by the executors and also by beneficiaries under the will to the mortgagees, who, however, ultimately sold the testator's reversionary interest in 1869, and out of the proceeds of sale retained the mortgage debt and handed over the balance to the executors. Upon the testator's residuary estate becoming divisible in 1894,

Held, that the testator's executors were entitled to retain as against the son's share of the residue, the amount of the mortgage debt retained by the mortgagees, and the payments made by the executors to the mortgagees, with interest at 4 per cent., but were not entitled to retain the amount contributed by other beneficiaries, nor to damages caused by the sale of the reversion instead of waiting for it to fall in.—Watson, Re, Turner v. Watson, CH.D. NORTH, J., 571.

5. Retainer—Surety—Promissory note—Money due, but not paid—Receiver—Administration—Claim after chief clerk's certificate filed.—A surety who is one of the executors of a testator is entitled to exercise his right of retainer in respect of the debt for which he is surety, if due though unpaid, out of the assets of the testator paid into court by the executors in an administration action; and such claim is not made too late even if first made after the chief clerk's certificate has become binding.—Giles, Re, Jones v. Pennefather, CH.D. KEKEWICH, J., 283.

6. Will—Leaseholds specifically bequeathed—Assent—Vesting—Inland Revenue—Estate Duty—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30) s. 9 (1).—Leaseholds specifically bequeathed pass to the executor as such, and consequently estate duty upon them is primarily payable out of the general personal estate of testator, as they do not come within the exception in section 9 of the Finance Act, 1894.

Leaseholds specifically bequeathed, upon the assent of the executor, vest absolutely in the specific legatee, and no deed of assignment by the executor is necessary.—Culverhouse, Re, Cook v. Culverhouse, CH.D. KEKEWICH, J.

EXTRADITION:—

1. Criminal law—Falsification of accounts—Warrant of committal—Extradition Treaty with France, article 3, clauses 2, 18—French Code Pénal, art. 147 —"Faux en écriture de commerce"—Larceny Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 96), s. 83—Falsification of Accounts Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 24), s. 1—Extradition Acts, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 52) and 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 60).—Where in proceedings for the extradition of a foreign subject evidence sufficient to justify a committal is given of the commission by him of acts which constitute a crime, both according to English law and according to the law of the foreign State, and within the Extradition Treaty, extradition cannot be refused on the ground that the crime imputed falls under different headings or classes of crime in the English and foreign systems of criminal law, or in the English and foreign versions of the Extradition Treaty.

The extradition was demanded of a French subject on a charge of "faux," the ordinary English equivalent of which is "forgery." He was committed by the magistrate upon evidence showing that he had committed acts constituting the offence of "faux en écriture de commerce" under article 147 of the Code Pénal, and covered by head 2 (French version) of article 3 of the Extradition Treaty with France, and also constituting an offence (not amounting to forgery in English law) under section 83 of the Larceny Act, 1861, and section 1 of the Falsification of Accounts Act, 1875, and covered by head 18 (English version) of article 3 of the Extradition Treaty.

Held, that the committal order was rightly made.—Arton, In re (No. 2), Q.B.D., 351.

2. Delivery up of British subject—Treaty with Belgium—Extradition Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 52), ss. 2, 6.—In 1876 a Treaty was signed between England and Belgium for the mutual surrender of fugitive criminals, and by an Order in Council the Extradition Act, 1870, was made to apply to this Treaty. In 1887, by a declaration between the two countries, it was provided that "in no case, nor on any consideration whatever, shall the high contracting parties be bound to surrender their own subjects."

Held, that while the contracting parties are not bound, they may under this Treaty surrender their own subjects; and that therefore the British Government had a discretion to surrender a fugitive criminal in this country, notwithstanding the fact that he was a British subject.—Galwey, Re, Q.B.D., 313.

Held, that the section refers to restrictions and conditions in existence at the time of the appointment, and that a council is not exempt from contributing to the expenses of such an appointment, under section 10 of the Act, for the reason that they disapproved of the expenditure subsequently to the appointment.—Reg. v. Plymouth (Mayor of), Q.B.D., 620.

2. Salmon fishery — Boundary — Crown, primâ facie claim—Practice.—Where in a pending cause it appears that the Crown has a primâ facie claim to salmon fishings in dispute, the court ought to direct intimation to be given to the Crown authorities, and stay proceedings pending the decision of the Crown as to whether it will interfere.—Ogston v. Stewart, P.C.

FRAUDS, STATUTES of:—

Interest in land—Landlord and tenant—Parol agreement for non-continuous letting and hiring of land—Entry on land for purposes of occupation after agreement—Exclusive possession during occupation—Statute of Frauds (29 Car 2, c. 3), s. 4.—Defendant verbally agreed with plaintiff to hire a field for three consecutive bank holidays, and to pay for the use of it the total sum of £45, which sum was to be paid by three equal payments on the days in question. Defendant occupied the field on the first of the three bank holidays only, and paid the instalment on account, but refused subsequently to pay the balance of the £45, and by way of defence to an action by the plaintiff, pleaded that under section 4 of the Statute of Frauds the agreement was void.

Held, that section 4 of the Statute of Frauds was no defence, because upon the evidence it appeared that the parol agreement was a single letting (although the period for the agreed letting was not continuous) at a single rent; and there had been an entry by the defendant on the land after the agreement for the purposes of occupation, and a payment of rent on account of entry.—Smallwood v. Sheppards, Q.B.D. 44.,

FRIENDLY SOCIETY:—

Dissolution—Infant members—Instrument of dissolution signed by fathers and guardians—Consent of governing committee—Action by trustees—Friendly Societies Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 63), ss. 9, 13, 15, 21, 25, 27—Friendly Societies Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 60), ss. 6, 9, 13, 15, 21, 25.—A friendly society consisting entirely of members between the ages of six and eighteen, and formed under the Friendly Societies Act, 1855, as a juvenile branch of a parent lodge, the government thereof being placed in the hands of a committee appointed by the parent lodge, was held precluded from dissolving itself under section 13 of the Act of 1855, or section 25 of the Act of 1875, without the consent of that committee.—Rudd v. James, C.A. land situate in one of the parishes.—Edwards v. Jenkins, CH.D. KEKEWICH, J., 407.

GAMING:—

1. Betting—Illegal Betting—Unlawful user of a place for the purpose of betting—"Place"—Betting Houses Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 119), s. 3.—The respondent, who was a bookmaker, was on several consecutive days standing on or near the same spot between two stays which supported a hoarding erected on a piece of vacant ground, and was there making bets on horse-races with persons who came to him for the purpose. The vacant ground was not circumscribed otherwise than by the hoarding which partially surrounded it.

Held, that the ground between the stays of the hoarding was a "place" within the meaning of section 3 of the Betting Houses Act, 1853, and that the respondent was guilty of the offence under that section of using a place for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto.

2. Partnership—Action for account—Bookmaker's business—Place used for betting—Betting Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 119), s. 3.—In an action by a turf commission agent or bookmaker against his partner, who was the active partner and transacted the business at race meetings, for an account of the profits of the business,

Held, that, inasmuch as the conduct of a bookmaker's business did not necessarily involve any violation of the provisions of the Betting Act, 1853, and it appeared that the plaintiff contemplated that the business would be carried on in conformity with the rules of Tattersall's enclosure at meetings, and not in such a manner as to come within the prohibition of the statute, the plaintiff was entitled to relief at the hands of the court, and the order must go for an account, notwithstanding that the defendant might have acted illegally at meetings.

Construction of the word "place" in the Betting Act, 1853, considered.—Thwaites v. Coulthwaite, CH.D. CHITTY, J., 295.

3. Stock Exchange—Transactions in stocks and shares—Deposit of securities as cover—Right to recover securities—Gaming Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 109), s. 18.—On certain written terms, which amounted to speculation in differences, S. opened an account and deposited with the appellants, who were outside brokers, certain securities as cover for any balance which might be found due to them. The result was a loss to S. above the value of the securities. In an action by S. to recover his securities the jury found on what was considered sufficient evidence that the transactions between the parties were gaming transactions.

Held, that the deposit was not made "to bide the event" of a wager, but as security against a debt which might arise from a gambling transaction, and therefore not within the 18th section of the Gaming Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 109), and consequently the securities might be recovered.—Universal Stock Exchange v. Strachan, H.L., 497.

4. Stocks and shares — Payment of differences — Money deposited as cover—Repudiation of gaming contract—Betting Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 109), s. 18.—The plaintiff deposited with the defendant a sum of money as cover in respect of certain gaming transactions in stocks and shares entered into with the defendant. Before the plaintiff gave notice that he repudiated the gaming contracts, the deposit had been absorbed by the winnings of the defendant.

Held, that, having regard to the provisions of section 18 of the Betting Act, 1845, the money could not be recovered.—Strachan v. Universal Stock Exchange Co., C.A., 90

GAS:—

1. Supply—Arrears of rates—Company—Receiver and manager — Whether tenants of company — Gas Works Act, 1847 (c. 15), s. 16—Gas Works Act, 1871 (c. 41), s. 11. — A gas company supplied the mill of a milling company with gas. A receiver and manager of the milling company was appointed by debenture-holders, and he entered into possession of the mill and continued the business. At that time there was a sum due to the gas company for arrears of gas rates during the milling company's occupation.

Held, that the receiver and manager was merely custodian of the milling company's property, and not an incoming tenant of, or a purchaser from, the milling company; and that the gas company was entitled to refuse to continue to supply gas unless the arrears were paid.

2. Supply of gas—Breach of statutory duty—Remedy—Right of action—Gasworks Clauses Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 41), ss. 11, 12, 36.—Where a gas company to whom the provisions of the Gasworks Clauses Act, 1871, apply cause damage to a consumer by reason of their failure to supply to him gas sufficient in quantity and quality to satisfy the requirements of the Act, an action will not lie by the consumer against the company in respect of such damage. The only remedy for breach of the statutory obligation of the company is by proceeding for penalties under section 36 of the Act.—Clegg, Parkinson, & Co. v. Earby Gas Co., Q.B.D., 606.

Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Appeal, ante, p. 55) that the duty was only payable upon grain imported for sale as grain, and that grain, which was imported in order to be manufactured before sale into a substance which could not be described as "grain," was not liable to duty.—Cotton v. Vogan, H.L.

the time being entitled to "actual possession" of the real estate.

Held, that the tenant in tail, who, having previously barred the entail, died during the lifetime of the tenant for life, had no such right in the heirlooms annexed to the hereditaments as to enable him to transfer them.—Angerstein v. Angerstein, CH.D., KEKEWICH, J., 152.

INLAND REVENUE:—

1. Account duty—Annuity to widow of deceased partner out of proceeds of business—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881 (44 Vict. c. 12), s. 38, sub-section 2 (c.)—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889 (52 Vict. c. 7), s. 11. Under a covenant in a contract of co-partnery the widow of one of the two partners became entitled, on the death of her husband, to be paid an annuity by the surviving partner out of the profits (if any) of the business—which, however, the surviving partner was not bound to carry on.

Held, that the annuity was "property" which "passed" to the widow under a voluntary settlement within the meaning of section 38, sub-section 2 (c.) of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, and section 11 of the Act of 1889, and was therefore chargeable with account duty.—Attorney-General v. Wendt, Q.B.D.

2. Account duty—Marriage settlement of widow—Children by former marriage—Voluntary disposition—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881 (44 Vict. c. 12), s. 38, sub-section (a) (c)—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889 (52 Vict. c 7), s. 11.—The consideration of marriage extends only to the husband and wife and the children of that marriage; all other persons are volunteers in some sense.

In a marriage settlement made by a widow on her second marriage, shares belonging to her were given to her adult sons by her former marriage, and other shares belonging to her were assigned to trustees upon trust as to some, for the benefit of other children of the widow by her former marriage, and as to the residue upon trust in the events that happened, but subject to certain life interests, to all her children by her former marriage. The settlor died in 1890, within five months of the execution of the settlement.

Held (reversing the decision of the Queen's Bench Division, 43 W. R. 253), that the children by the former marriage were not within the marriage consideration, but were volunteers; that, therefore, the Crown was entitled to account duty under the Customs and Inland Revenue Acts, 1881 and 1889, as upon a voluntary disposition in respect of the shares taken by the children of the former marriage.

Gale v. Gale, 25 W. R. 772, 6 Ch. D. 144, distinguished.—Attorney-General v. Jacobs-Smith, C.A.

3. Account duty—Voluntary transfer—Customs and Inland Revenue Acts, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 12), s. 38, sub-section 1, 2 (b); 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 7), s. 11.—The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, s. 38, sub-section 2 (b), enacts that account stamp duty shall be paid upon any property "voluntarily" transferred by the deceased into the joint names of himself and another person, so that the beneficial interest in such property accrues by survivorship to such other person.

Held, the word "voluntarily" is used in this sub-section in its ordinary meaning of "without compulsion" or "without obligation," and does not mean "without consideration."—Attorney-General v. Ellis, Q.B.D., 13.

4. Estate duty—Settlement estate duty—Settled legacies—Duties payable out of residuary estate—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), ss. 1, 2, 4, 5 (1) (a), 6, 8, 9.—Testator, who died after the Finance Act, 1894, came into operation, gave a pecuniary legacy to persons by way of succession, and bequeathed his residuary personal estate in shares, some of which were given absolutely and others to persons in succession.

Held, that under the Finance Act, 1894, settlement estate duty as well as estate duty in respect of both classes of the settled legacies should be borne by, and was payable by the executors out of, the general residuary estate.—Webber, Re, Gribble v. Webber, CH.D. NORTH, J., 489.

5. Estate Duty—Settlement—Power of appointment

—Appointment of specific portion to one—Residue of settled fund appointed to others—Apportionment of duty—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), s. 6, sub-section (4); s. 8, sub-section (4); s. 14, sub-section (1).—By a settlement of 1841 a fund was directed to be laid out in the purchase of lands to be held on trust for A. for life, with remainder as B. should by will appoint. B. died in 1886 in A.'s lifetime, having by will directed the reconversion into money of the trust premises, and appointed a specific amount part thereof to C. absolutely, and the residue to others. The life tenant A. died after the Finance Act, 1894, came into operation. The fund had never been invested in the purchase of land.

Held, (1) that the fund must be treated as land; (2) that it was "property which passed" on the death of A., and was therefore liable to estate duty under section 1 of the Finance Act; (3) that the amount appointed to C. was a "sum charged on the property" within the meaning of section 14, sub-section (1); and (4) that the estate duty on the whole appointed fund should be borne rateably by C. and the appointees of the rest of the fund.—Orford (Countess), Re, Cartwright v. Del Balzo, CH.D, NORTH, J., 383.

6. Estate duty—Voluntary covenant to pay money on death of covenantor — Liability of estate of covenantor—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), ss. 1, 2, 6, 7, 8, 9.—A testator who died after the Finance Act, 1894, came into operation had covenanted to pay, within six months of his decease, a sum of money to the trustees of his son's marriage settlement.

Held, that under the Finance Act, 1894, estate duty was payable upon the sum covenanted to be paid, and that such duty should be borne, not by the covenantees, but by the testator's residuary estate; for the covenant, although a debt for all other purposes, was not a debt which, under section 7 of the Finance Act, could be deducted in ascertaining the estate duty; and the covenantees being creditors were not persons taking under the will within the meaning of section 9.—Gray v. Gray, CH.D. NORTH, J., 406

7. Excise—Dog tax—Shepherds' dogs—Certificate of exemption — Justices — Jurisdiction— Offence of trifling nature—30 & 31 Vict. c. 5, s. 8—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878 (41 Vict. c. 15), s. 22 — Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49), s. 16.—Justices have no jurisdiction to review the decision of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue refusing to grant a certificate of exemption from the dog tax under section 22 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878. They cannot refuse to convict the owner of a dog who has neither a licence nor a certificate of exemption on the ground that he is in their opinion entitled to such a certificate, and that his offence is therefore of a trifling nature within the meaning of section 16 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879.—Phillips v. Evans, Q.B.D., 429.

8. Excise—Licence to deal in plate—Soliciting orders—Secretary of watch club—Inland Revenue Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 90), ss. 1, 3, 17.—The respondent was a telegraph clerk and the secretary of a watch club formed in a provincial town by a London watchmaker who held an excise licence for dealing in plate. The respondent collected subscriptions from the members of the club, and at intervals conducted a ballot, the winner in which was entitled to select a watch or other article supplied by the watchmaker. The respondent thereupon informed the watchmaker as to the article chosen, and the article was forwarded by the watchmaker to the respondent, who handed it to the member in question. The respondent was paid a commission by the watchmaker. The respondent had no excise licence to deal in plate.

Held, that the respondent was a person soliciting, taking, or receiving orders within the meaning of section 17 of the Inland Revenue Act, 1867, and was not within the exemption as to bonâ fide travellers in that section, and was therefore liable to a penalty.—Killick v. Graham; Lintern v. Burchell, Q.B.D., 669.

9. Income tax—County council—Interest arising on loans—Deductions—16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, Schedule D. —The London County Council, under the powers and provisions of various Acts of Parliament, borrowed large sums of money for their own purposes and for the purpose of lending sums of money to various local bodies. Upon these borrowed sums they paid interest, income tax being deducted by the Bank of England and paid over to the Inland Revenue, and upon the sums they lent they received interest. In 1894 they were served with a notice of assessment under Schedule D of the Income Tax Act (16 & 17 Vict. c. 34) in respect of a sum of £352,021, being interest received by them in the year ending March, 1893, in full without deduction of income tax, upon loans advanced by them.

Held, that the London County Council were properly so assessed. The interest they received was part of their funds and part of the corpus of the property which they enjoyed, and they ought to pay income tax on it.

The London County Council could not be treated as a trading concern so as to bring the money they borrowed, on the one side, and the money they lent, on the other side, into an account.—London County Council v. Grove. Q.B.D., 599.

10. Income tax—Deductions—Money laid out or expended for the purposes of trade—Money paid to an employee in compensation for his dismissal—Income Tax Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), s. 100, Schedule.—By the terms of an agreement for the purchase by the appellant company of the business of another insurance company, the appellant company agreed to take into their service the manager of the other company at a salary of £4,000 a year, or, in the event of their electing not to retain him, to pay him a lump sum in commutation of his salary, the manager undertaking not to enter the service of any other insurance company. Shortly after the transference took place, the appellant company elected not to retain the manager, and paid him a lump sum.

Held, that the sum so paid could not be properly deducted from the gross profits of the business of the appellant company for the purpose of ascertaining the amount on which income tax was payable, seeing that it was not money "wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of" the business.—Watson v. Royal Insurance Co., C.A., 89.

11. Income tax—Deductions—Money wholly laid out for purposes of trade—Colliery company—Contributions to Coalowners' Association—Income Tax Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), s. 100, Schedule D, rules applying to the first and second cases, rule 1.—The owners of a colliery were members of a coalowners' association, and paid to the funds of that association certain sums of money in return for which the association indemnified them against losses in case of strikes. In returning the amount of their profits for the purposes of the Income Tax Act, the colliery owners claimed to deduct the yearly average of the excess of their contributions over the amounts received as indemnities.

Held, that the deductions claimed could not be allowed, as the subscriptions paid to the association were not "money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of" the trade carried on by the colliery owners, within the meaning of the first of the rules applying to both the first and second cases in Schedule D, section 1, of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35.—Rhymney Iron Co. v. Fowler, Q.B.D, 651.

12. Income tax—Foreign trade—Agents in United Kingdom—Agent "having the receipt of profits or gains"—Assessment of agent in name of principal resident abroad—Income Tax Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), ss. 41 and 44—Income Tax Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 34), s. 2, Schedule D.—A foreign wine merchant carrying on business at Rheims employed agents in this country to canvass for orders to be forwarded to him for execution if he thought fit. Upon acceptance of the order the principal invoiced the goods in his name to the customer and delivered them on board at Rheims at the expense and risk of the customer. The amounts due were usually forwarded direct by the customer to the principal, but in some cases received by the agents.

Held (Lord Morris dissenting), that the foreign principal did not exercise a trade in the United Kingdom within the meaning of the Income Tax Acts, 1842 and 1853.

Semble, that in section 41 of the Income Tax Act, 1842, the words "having the receipt of any profits or gains" should be read so as to apply to the words "factor" and "agent" as well as the word "receiver."

Decision of the Court of Appeal, 43, W. R. 184, [1895] 1 Q. B. 71, reversed.—Grainger v. Gough, H.L., 561.

13. Income tax—Interest on foreign investments of English company—Profits invested abroad—Schedule D of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, s. 100.—An insurance company, having its head offices at Norwich, carried on business abroad by means of branches in New York, New Zealand, and elsewhere. In order to do so, it became necessary to have capital invested abroad, and from time to add to these foreign investments as the business of the company increased. For this purpose the interest accruing from these investments was set aside and invested abroad, and, although shown in the credit account of the annual balance-sheet of the company issued from the head office in England as profits, was never specifically remitted to or received in the United Kingdom.

Held, that these investments abroad were necessary for the profitable carrying on abroad of the company's business, and that the interest arising from such investments was taxable as profits.—Norwich Union Fire Insurance Co. v. Magee, Q.B.D., 384.

14. Income tax—Profits and gains of English company owning railway abroad—Control in England—Profits received in England—Income Tax Acts, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), s. 100, Schedule D, cases 1, 5; 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 34), s. 2, Schedule D.—An English company, with a registered office in London, was incorporated for the purpose of making and working a railway in Brazil. The directors resided in England, and controlled at the London office the whole conduct and management of the company, but the profits were earned in Brazil.

Held, that the company did not carry on its business exclusively out of the United Kingdom, and was therefore assessable to the income tax under case 1, Schedule D—viz., on the full amount of their net profits and gains.

Decision of the Court of Appeal, 43 W. R. 339, [1895] 1 Q. B. 580, affirmed.—San Paulo Railway Co. v. Carter, H.L,. 336.

15. Inhabited house duty—Exemption—"Charity school"—48 Geo. 3, c. 55, Schedule B, case 4—14 & 15 Vict. c. 36, s. 2.—By 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, Schedule B (repealed by 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 19, but re-enacted by 14 & 15 Vict. c. 36), "any hospital, charity school, or house provided for the reception or relief of poor persons" is exempted from inhabited house duty.

An institution is a charity school within the schedule if its primary object is the education of those who cannot afford to educate themselves.

A college was founded with the object of enabling women to continue their education after leaving school with all the advantages of a collegiate life. The college was maintained partly by endowment and partly by students' fees, but the fees alone would not have been sufficient to carry on the college in the manner directed by the deed of trust.

Held, that the college was not a charity school, and the exemption from inhabited house duty contained in 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, Schedule B, did not apply to it.—Southwell v. Royal College, Holloway, Q.B.D., 315.

16. Inhabited house duty—Public school—Head master's house—School buildings—Chapel, library, &c.—Mode of assessment—43 Geo. 3, c. 55, Schedule B—14 & 15 Vict. c. 36.—In the Clifton College case an assessment was made of £1,978 upon the college in respect of inhabited house duty. The buildings assessed comprised the school itself, the head master's house, the chapel, library, sanatorium, gymnasium, racquet courts, fives courts, swimming baths, carpenter's shops, museum, garden, and playground, all of which were within one boundary. The head master held his house under a lease subject to his continuing to hold that post; he resided there himself, together with sixty-seven boarders; he paid no rent. With the exception of the sanatorium, no one slept in any of the other buildings.

Held, that the head master was the occupier of his dwelling-house, and was taxable in respect of such occupation with inhabited house duty. He did not, however, in any sense occupy the various other buildings; there was nothing to show that they belonged to or were occupied with his dwelling-house, and they could not be themselves treated as dwelling-houses.

In the Charterhouse case an assessment of £3,000 for inhabited house duty was made upon the governing body of the school. The buildings assessed were the head master's house (the head master was bound by the school statutes to reside in the house, he paid no rent, and took in sixty boys as boarders), two assistant masters' houses (these masters paid rent and took in boys as boarders), the chapel, hall, library, classrooms, laundry, science rooms, museum and theatre, carpenter's shop, drawing school, sanatoriums, swimming baths, racquet courts, lodges, and other buildings.

Held, that the head master and assistant masters ought to be treated as the occupiers of their houses respectively. They occupied the houses for their own profit, and not merely as representatives of the school or the governors, and they were therefore assessable to the inhabited house duty. The governing body were not assessable for the other premises, as, with the exception of the sanatoriums, they were not inhabited dwelling-houses taken by themselves.—Clifton College v. Thompson; Charterhouse School v. Gayler, Q.B.D., 410.

17. Inhabited house duty — Tenements — Lessee dividing premises into a dwelling-house and a shop respectively—Lessee retaining the shop and sub-letting the dwelling-house—Assessment made on the whole of the premises—House Tax Act, 1803, s. 10—48 Geo. 3, c. 55, Schedule B, rr. 3, 6, 14—Land Tax Act, 1851—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 15), s. 13 (1) and (2).—A trading company became the lessees of a house, which they had divided, before taking possession, into two distinct and separate tenements. The lower tenement they retained themselves, but used it solely as a shop for the purposes of their trade, the upper tenement they let for residential occupation to a tenant, who was not a servant of the company.

The whole of the premises having been assessed to inhabited house duty:—

Held, that the assessment was right, as the exemption conferred by section 13 of the Inland Revenue Act, 1878, in respect of business premises, was intended to extend only to the case of a person who let the whole of a house in separate tenements, and did not apply where the landlord or lessee retained the occupation of part of the premises for the purposes of his own business or trade.—Hoddinott v. Home and Colonial Stores, Q.B.D., 285.

18. Legacy duty—Annuity—Accumulations—Term of years to secure—Annuitant tenant for life subject to term—Legacy Duty Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 76), s. 4.—A testator devised estates to trustees for a term of 500 years upon certain trusts, and subject thereto to certain persons successively for life. The trusts of the term were (inter alia) to pay to the person who for the time being should, subject to the term, be entitled under the will to the possession or receipt of the rents and profits of the devised estates a certain annuity. Subject to that trust, the trustees were directed, during the period of twenty-one years from the testator's death, to accumulate the rents and profits arising from the hereditaments comprised in the term, and apply the same, with the accumulations, upon trust to purchase land and settle the same as nearly as possible in the same manner as the estates devised by the will, and after the determination of the period of twenty-one years upon trust to pay the rents and profits to the person or persons for the time being entitled to the hereditaments comprised in the term and the reversion expectant on the term.

The testator died on the 2nd of November, 1875, and upon the death of C. D., on the 12th of April, 1893, J. D. became entitled to receive from the trustees an annuity of £3,000, and became tenant for life subject to the term.

Held, affirming the decision of Stirling, J., 43 W. R. 630 (Rigby, L.J., dissenting), that, having regard to the substance rather than the conveyancing form of the gift, the annuity to which J. D. became entitled was not one charged upon his own estate, and that consequently legacy duty was payable upon it by virtue of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 74, s. 4, and not succession duty.

Shirley v. Earl Ferrers, 1 Ph. 167, distinguished.—De Hoghton, Re, De Hoghton v. De Hoghton (No. 1), C.A., 550.

19. Probate duty—Certificate of shares held in foreign companies—Realizable asset of estate—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 12), s. 27—Probate Court Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 77), s. 92.—An English testator was possessed of share certificates of a foreign company, being documents necessary to establish the legal title to the shares; the holder of the certificates having an equitable title which would enable him to obtain registration of the shares in his own name in the foreign country. Delivery of the certificates was sufficient to transfer this equitable title, and the certificates were marketable on the London Stock Exchange.

Held, that probate duty was payable in respect of the certificates.—Stern v. Reg., Q.B.D., 302.

20. Probate duty—Partnership—Option to purchase partnership premises within period after testator's death—Will—Extension of period—Option exercised in extended period—Conversion—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, s. 27.—The proceeds of sale of real estate, sold after a testator's death, in order to be liable to probate duty must have been sold pursuant to a contract subsisting at the death.

A testator, in partnership with his sons, agreed in the partnership deed that the sons should have the option to purchase the partnership premises, consisting of freeholds and leaseholds, within a certain period after his death. By his will he extended the period. The sons exercised the option after the original period fixed by the articles had expired, but within the extended period.

Held, probate duty not payable on the proceeds of sale of the freeholds.—Goodall v. Goodall, CH.D. NORTH, J., 70.

21. Probate duty—Undistributed residuary estate of English testator—Foreign mortgages forming part of such undistributed residuary estate—Liability to probate duty of the estate of English residuary legatee.—An English testatrix was entitled, under the will of her husband—a domiciled Englishman whose will was proved in England by English executors—to one-fourth share of his residuary estate. That estate included, among other property, money invested in mortgages of real estate in New Zealand. At the date of the testatrix's death no part of the residuary estate had been distributed, nor had any of the mortgages been converted.

Held (Lord Esher, M.R., dissenting), that the testatrix's share in her deceased husband's residuary estate was an English chose in action, and that probate duty was payable in England by her executors on one-fourth of the New Zealand mortgages.

Decision of the Divisional Court, 43 W. R. 700, reversed.—Attorney-General v. Sudeley (Lord), C.A., 340.

22. Stamp duty—Bond being security for annuity or sum of money at stated periods—Sum payable weekly for indefinite period—Ad valorem duty on annuity or "sum periodically payable"—Duty on What sum to be calculated — Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39)—Schedule.—In the 1st Schedule to the Stamp Act, 1891, any bond, covenant, or instrument being the only or principal or primary security for any annuity, or for any sum of money at stated periods (not being interest or rent), if such sum be for the term of life or any other indefinite period, is made liable to a duty of 2s. 6d. for every £5 "of the annuity or sum periodically payable."

C. and H. entered into an agreement under seal whereby H. was to become the manager of an hotel owned by C., was to receive all the profits and pay to C. a certain sum weekly. The agreement could be terminated by either party on giving three months' notice, and was expressed to be neither a demise nor a deed of partnership.

Held, that the "annuity or sum periodically payable" on which the ad valorem duty ought to be charged was the sum payable weekly only, and not the same sum multiplied by fifty-two and regarded as an annual payment.—Clifford v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, Q.B.D.

23. Stamp duty — Commissioners of Customs — Transfer order to by merchant—Whether or not a bill of exchange—Sole purpose of remitting money—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), s. 32, and Schedule "Bill of Exchange," exemption (10).—The goods of A., a merchant, being subject to the payment of customs duty, A. gave to the revenue officer a document addressed to the cashier of the Bank of England, drawn and signed by B. & Co., his bankers, which was in the following terms: "Transfer from our account to the account of the Commissioners of Customs £225 16s. 7d." (the amount payable in respect of the duty payable in respect of A.'s goods). On the receipt of such document the revenue officer cleared the goods.

Held, that such document was a bill of exchange payable on demand within the meaning of the Stamp Act, 1891, s. 32, and that it did not fall within the exemption (10) as being drawn for the sole purpose of remitting money to be placed to an account of public revenue. — London Clearing Bankers v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, C.A., 516.

24. Stamp duty — Conveyance on sale — Colonial patent—Licence to use in colony—Property locally situate out of United Kingdom—Stamp Act, 1891 (c. 39) s. 59, sub-section (1).—A share in a patent granted in New South Wales and a sole licence to use the patented invention in a specified district of that colony, are "property" within section 59, sub-section 1 of the Stamp Act, 1891, and do not come within the exception in that sub-section in favour of "lands, tenements, or property, locally situate out of the United Kingdom." An agreement made in England for the sale of the share in the patent and of the licence, is, therefore, liable to ad valorem stamp duty under that sub-section as though it were an actual conveyance on sale.—Smelting Co. of Australia v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, Q.B.D.

25. Stamp duty—Conveyance—Agreement for sale of goodwill and trade-marks—Business carried on abroad and in England—Trade-mark registered in England—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), s. 59.—An agreement under seal was entered into for the sale of a business carried on in the United States, including the goodwill of the said business and the trade-marks and names used in connection therewith, to purchasers in the United Kingdom. The vendors were manufacturers of soap in America, a large proportion of which they sold wholesale to a syndicate in England. The vendors were also owners of a trade-mark registered in and extensively advertised throughout the United Kingdom, whereby a demand for the soap had been created therein.

Held, that the goodwill and trade-mark were "property" within the meaning of section 59 of the Stamp Act, 1891, and not "property locally situate out of the United Kingdom" within the exception contained in that section, and that therefore so much of the consideration as represented the price paid for the said goodwill and trade-mark was chargeable with conveyance duty under section 59 of the Stamp Act, 1891.—Brooke v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, Q.B.D., 670.

26. Stamp duty—Equitable mortgage—Foreclosure — Conveyance by order of court—"Conveyance on sale"—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), ss. 54, 57.—A conveyance executed by order of the court by a mortgagor, the equitable mortgagee having obtained a foreclosure decree, is a "conveyance on sale" within the meaning of section 54 of the Stamp Act, 1891, and as such is chargeable with an ad valorem duty, vide "Conveyance or Transfer on Sale" in the schedule to the Act; and by section 57 the debt is the consideration in respect whereof the conveyance is chargeable.—Huntington v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, Q.B.D., 300.

27. Stamp duty—Marketable security—Promissory note—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), ss. 82 (1) (b); 122.—An American railway company, as security for a temporary loan, handed through, their English agents, to the lender a certain instrument in writing which stated that for value received they promised to pay twelve months after date to the order of themselves, the amount therein named; and it also stated that it was one of a series, and was secured by a deposit of gold bonds which were under an existing trust deed to be held in trust for the benefit of the holders of the instruments. The instruments which had been indorsed before issue, were dealt in upon the London Stock Exchange though not officially quoted there.

Held, that the instrument was not a mere promissory note; that it contained a contract that the holder should be entitled to the benefit of the security mentioned in it; that it was consequently a security for the money lent upon it; and that it required to be stamped as a "marketable security" within the meaning of section 82, sub-section (1) (b), and section 122 of the Stamp Act, 1891.

Decision of the Divisional Court ([1895] 1 Q. B. 240) reversed.—Brown, Shipley, & Co. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, C.A.

28. Stamp duty—Practice—Evidence—Unstamped promissory note—Document used for purpose of refreshing memory—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), s. 38 (1).—In an action for money lent an unstamped promissory note may be put in the hands of the defendant for the purpose of challenging his memory as to whether he had signed the note and had received the money, although such note could not be used as evidence, and, notwithstanding that by section 38 of the Stamp Act, 1891, it is provided that a promissory note not duly stamped shall not be "available for any purpose whatever."—Birchall v. Bullough, Q.B.D., 300.

29. Succession duty—Freehold premises devised subject to leases—Increased value at determination of leases—Liability of successor—Succession Duty Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 51), ss. 15, 20, 21, 42.—Joseph M., who died in 1873, devised two freehold premises to George M. These houses were at the date of testator's death let on leases at rents not purporting to be rack-rents. In 1877 succession duty was paid in respect of both houses, based on the rents then reserved by the said leases. In 188 both houses were sold to the defendants, who were the tenants of one of the houses. In 1889 the leases expired, and the defendants became entitled in possession to the full value of the houses, which value was greater than the rents reserved by the said leases. The crown claimed that under sections 20 and 21 of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 51 duty became payable in 1889 by the defendants in respect of the increased value accruing to them upon the determination of the leases as an annuity during the residue of the lives of the defendants equal to the increase of annual value.

Held, that the defendants were not "successors" at all; they had bought property to which George M. had already succeeded, and were not liable to pay duty as successors. They were only liable by virtue of section 42 for what George M. would have been liable for—namely, duty on the increase of value by the falling in of the leases calculated as an annuity during the residue of George M.'s life equal to the increase of annual value.—Attorney-General v. Mander, Q.B.D., 413.

INNKEEPER:—

Lien—Commercial traveller—Goods the property of a third person.—A commercial traveller, whilst staying at an inn for the purpose of carrying on his business, had sent to him by his employers certain goods for sale, which goods the innkeeper, at the time they were received, knew did not belong to the traveller, but to his employers. On the traveller failing to pay for his board and lodging, the innkeeper detained certain of the said goods, claiming a lien on them.

Held, that the innkeeper had a good lien upon the goods in respect of the debt incurred by the traveller.—Robins v. Gray, C.A., 1.

INSURANCE:—

1. Accident—"incapacitated from employment by reason of accident"—Nervous shock through fright.—By a policy of insurance the defendants undertook to pay to the plaintiff, who was a signalman in their employment, the sum of £1 a week "in case of his being incapacitated from employment by reason of accident sustained in discharge of his duty in the company's service," the insurance to be "absolute for all accidents however caused to the insured in the fair and ordinary discharge of his duty." While the plaintiff was on duty in his signal-box he saw an express train approaching with sparks and dust flying from it, one of the carriages having broken down. The plaintiff waved a flag to stop the train, and was so excited and terrified that an accident would happen to the train that he received a nervous shock to his system and became incapacitated from employment.

Held, that this was an "accident sustained" by the plaintiff in the discharge of his duty within the meaning of the policy, and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover.—Pugh v. London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Co., C.A., 627.

2. Accident — Policy — Continuing policy — New contract every year.—A policy of insurance against accident for the term of one year was renewable from time to time by consent.

Held, that each renewal must be considered as a new contract, and not as a renewal of the original contract; and consequently, that where the assured assigned all his property to a trustee for the benefit of his creditors and died two years afterwards from an accident while the renewed policy was existing, the insurance money belonged not to the trustee of the creditors, but to the executors of the assured.—Stokell v. Heywood, CH.D. KEKEWICH, J.

3. Assignment of rights to insurer—Settlement of claim—Judicature Act (Queensland) (40 Vict. c. 86).—B. insured the safe delivery of certain wool in the V. Insurance Co. The wool was lost owing to the negligence of K., and the insurance company honestly paid the claim made upon them for such loss by B., and took from him a formal assignment of his causes of action against K., B. stipulating that the assignment should not authorize the use of his name in legal proceedings.

Held, that the insurance company were entitled to the remedies available to B. against K., and although the subrogation by act of law would not give the insurance company a right to sue in their own name, the Judicature Act (corresponding with the English Judicature Act of 1873) and the above assignment together would.—King v. Victoria Insurance Co., P.C., 592.

4. *Life—Policies for benefit of wife and children—Domicile of assured—Foreign assurance company—*Lex loci contractûs—Lex loci solutionis.—Policies of assurance on his life were effected by a domiciled Englishman with an American assurance company through their English branch office. The moneys assured were expressed to be payable to the wife of the assured, for her sole use if living, "in conformity with the statute," and, if not living, to the children of the assured, or their guardian for their use, or if there should be no such children surviving, then to the executors, administrators, or assigns of the assured.

Held, that the policies, in accordance with the intention of the parties, must be construed, so far as related to the distribution of the assurance moneys, in accordance with the lex loci solutionis, the law of the place of domicile of the assured.

Held, also, that all the children of the assured took vested interests as tenants in common.—Crosland v. Wrigley, C.A.

5. Marine— Constructive total loss — Chartered freight—Bill of lading freight—Advanced freight—Delivery of cargo at port of destination—Rights of underwriters.—A ship, which was chartered for a particular voyage, was insured by the owners. The cargo was shipped under bills of lading, which provided that the cargo was to be delivered at the port of destination to the order of the shippers or their assigns, they paying freight as per charter-party. Part of the charter-party freight was prepaid before the commencement of the voyage. During the voyage the ship became a constructive total loss, and notice of abandonment was given to, and accepted by, the underwriters. The ship and cargo were subsequently brought to the port of destination and the cargo was delivered, and the shipowners received the amount of the freight, less the prepaid freight, from the consignees of the cargo.

Held, that the underwriters were only entitled to the freight earned by the delivery of the cargo after the ship became their property; that the freight so earned was the difference between the total freight and the prepaid freight; and that therefore they were not entitled to recover the balance.—Red Sea, The, C.A., 306.

6. Marine— Freight—Inception of risk—"From the time of the engagement of the goods"—"At and from"—Vessel lost before arrival at port of loading.—Shipowners were insured on freight "at and from" any port or ports of loading on the west coast of South America to ports described in the policies. The policies were in the usual Lloyds form, but each contained, in addition to certain other provisions, the following clause: "This policy to cover the freight from the time of the engagement of the goods or after a shipping order has been issued by the agent or his broker." A steamer belonging to the insured whilst proceeding from the River Plate to Valparaiso in order to load cargo there and at other ports on the west coast of South America was lost by perils insured against. At the time of her loss cargo had been engaged for her and was ready for shipment by her at Valparaiso and at other ports on the west coast, the freight upon which was afterwards declared on the policies:

Held, that the insured could not recover under the policies, inasmuch as the words "from the time of the engagement of the goods" must be read subject to the "at and from" clause which defined the time and place of commencement of the risk, and that, therefore, under the circumstances the policy had never attached.

Decision of Barnes, J., [1896] P. 154, affirmed.—Copernicus, The, C.A.

7. Marine—Goods—Partial or total loss—How partial loss calculated—Costs of conditioning—Average.—A cargo of rice on board a lighter was insured by a policy wherein the rice was valued at £450. While the policy was in force the lighter was sunk by perils insured against, and the rice damaged. The damaged rice was afterwards kiln-dried at a cost of £68, and sold as damaged rice for £111, being almost one-third of its sound value.

Held, that the rice was not a total loss, but a partial loss only; and that the mode of ascertaining the partial loss was to obtain the difference between the sound value and the price which the damaged rice actually fetched, without deducting the cost of the kiln-drying; the proportion of this loss to the sound value is the proportion of the value in the policy to which the assured is entitled.—Francis v. Boulton, Q.B.D., 222.

8. Marine—Live cattle—All risks, including mortality, from any cause whatsoever—Detention in port of refuge — Extra fodder—Suing and labouring clause.—A marine policy of insurance on live cattle against all risks, including mortality, from any cause whatsoever, renders the insurer liable under the suing and labouring clause for the extra cost of fodder supplied to the cattle while the vessel was detained in a port of refuge for necessary repairs due to perils of the sea, for there is danger of total loss unless the expense is incurred.—Pomeranian, The, P.D. & AD.D.

9. Marine—Policy of re-insurance—Construction of policy.—A policy of re-insurance, whereby the plaintiffs re-insured with the defendant, contained a clause that the re-insurance was to be "subject to the same conditions as the original policy, and to pay as may be paid thereon, but against the risk of total or constructive loss only."

Held, that upon the construction of this clause the defendant was only bound to pay to the plaintiffs when the plaintiffs were themselves liable to pay in respect of the loss re-insured, and that if the plaintiffs made a bonâ fide payment for a total loss when there was no total loss, they could not recover from the defendant.—Chippendale v. Holt, Q.B.D., 128.

10. Marine — Policy on ship — Life salvage—Liability of underwriter—Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 544.—Life salvage is not a loss for which under Lloyds policy on ship in the usual form an underwriter is liable.—Nourse v. Liverpool Sailing Shipowners' Protection Association, C.A., 500.

11. Marine—Salvage—Perils of sea—Unseaworthiness—Time policy.—Where a vessel left port with an insufficient supply of bunker coal for her whole voyage, and was lying helpless at sea till towed by a passing tug,

Held, that the salvage expenses could not be recovered from her underwriters as an average loss under a time policy.—Ballantyne v. Mackinnon, Q.B.D.

12. Marine—Ship—Salvage—Total loss.—A ship whose cargo was insured for £3,300 took fire at sea and was abandoned. She was afterwards picked up by another vessel whose crew extinguished the flames and towed her into Rio, where they claimed salvage. The claim was settled in England the underwriters of the cargo contributing £1,250 "on account without prejudice." Instructions were sent to Brazil to release the ship, but the Brazilian court had sold the ship and retained the proceeds:

Held, that the underwriters must pay a total loss and could not deduct the £1,250 paid in settlement of the salvage claim.—Buchanan v. London and Provincial Marine Insurance Co., Q.B.D.

13. Marine—Syndicate of underwriters—Policy signed by manager of syndicate—Joint or several liability of members—Partnership.—The manager of a syndicate of underwriters, which had been formed under an agreement, entered into a policy of re-insurance on ships valued at £79,300. The subscription form was signed by the manager as manager for the syndicate, and the proportion which each member underwrote was written opposite his name. The agreement authorized the manager to sign policies on behalf of the syndicate, and under it no liability was to attach to any member beyond his own proportion set opposite to his name, and the profits or losses were to be divided amongst or to be borne by the members in proportion to the amounts subscribed by each.

Held, that the liability on the policy was not a joint, but a several liability, and that the agreement did not constitute the members partners in the business.—Tyser v. Shipowners Syndicate, Q.B.D., 207.

14. Marine—Time policy—Hull and machinery—"Warranted uninsured" — "Honour" policy—"Disbursements"—Breach of warranty.—The plaintiff effected a time policy of insurance with the defendants on the hull and machinery of a steamship of the value of £10,000, and by the policy warranted that £5,000 was uninsured. The total amount insured on the hull and machinery was £5,000, but the plaintiff effected "honour" policies (i.e., policies void under 19 Geo. 2, c. 27) on "disbursements" to the extent of £2,600. The disbursements were made in respect of coal, stores, provisions, and port expenses.

Held (affirming the decision of Kennedy, J.), that the disbursements were not covered by the words hull and machinery, and that there had been no breach of the warranty.

Quære, whether the latter policy, being null and void at law, could, under any circumstances, constitute an infringement of the warranty in the earlier policy.—Roddick v. Indemnity Marine Insurance Co., C.A., 27.

15. Marine—Valued policy—Insurance against fire—Depreciation by stranding—Repairs not done when a subsequent total loss occurred by fire—Right of assured to recover under fire policy.—The steamship B. was insured with certain underwriters against the perils of the sea, and with the defendant company against loss by fire and explosion only. The vessel, through stress of weather, was driven ashore and became a constructive total loss. While stranded she was totally destroyed by fire.

Held, that the insured were entitled to recover from the defendant company upon the ground that the loss by stranding would only become a total loss if due notice of abandonment of the ship were given; if no such notice were given the loss would be a particular average only, and that a partial loss, however serious, would not impair the right of the assured to recover for a subsequent total loss upon the basis of the valuation by which, in case of loss by fire, the parties agreed the indemnity was to be calculated.—Woodside v. Globe Marine Insurance Co., Q.B.D., 187.

16. Mortgage — Debenture—Company — Insolvency of insurance company—Scheme of arrangement—Discharge of liability.—The appellants insured the debentures in a limited company, the directors of which undertook to repay the insurers all sums within a prescribed amount which the latter should have paid under the insurance policy.

Default was made in payment of the debentures, and the appellants passed a resolution for voluntary winding up; a scheme of arrangement between the appellants and the directors of the limited company was sanctioned by the court, under which "in lieu of its liabilities under such policies" the rate of interest payable by the appellant corporation was, as from the date of the winding-up resolution, reduced, and the time for payment of the principal was extended.

The appellants made a payment of interest calculated on the original rate up to the date of winding up, and at the reduced rate for the period subsequent thereto, and claimed to be re-imbursed by the directors of the limited company.

Held, that the directors of the limited company were not liable, as the payment was made wholly under the scheme of arrangement and not under the policy. — Mortgage Insurance Corporation v. Pound, H.L.

JAMAICA, LAW of:—

Trade-mark—Registration—"Club Soda"—Misrepresentation by plaintiff of his goods.—In an action by the appellant who had registered his English trade-mark of "Club Soda" in Jamaica, under Law 17 of 1888, it appeared that the respondents persisted in selling their goods under the same name in a way calculated to deceive.

Held, that the appellant was not disentitled to relief merely because he had printed on his label the words "manufactured in Ireland by H.M. Royal Letters Patent." Those words, explained by the evidence to relate to patented machinery, did not necessarily represent or induce belief contrary to the fact that the ingredients of their article were patented.—Cochrane v. Macnish, P.C.

JAPAN, LAW of:—

Consular courts — Jurisdiction — Counterclaim against Japanese plaintiff. — By treaty between Great Britain and Japan, the English Consular Courts in Japan and the Territorial Courts of Japan have exclusive jurisdiction over claims against British and Japanese subjects respectively.

The defendants, an English company, being sued by the Emperor of Japan in a British Consular Court for damages resulting from a maritime collision, counterclaimed in respect of the same collision as due to the negligence of the plaintiff's servants.

Held, that there was no jurisdiction to entertain the counterclaim in the Consular Court, the cognizance of such claim belonging to the Territorial Court.—Imperial Japanese Government v. Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Co., P.C.

JOINTURE.—See POWER, 5.

JUSTICES:—

1. Certiorari—Summons for an offence punishable by fine or imprisonment—Dismiss by justices—Nemo bis vexari pro eadem causa.—A writ of certiorari cannot be issued to quash an order for acquittal made by justices on the hearing of a summons for an offence punishable by fine and imprisonment.—Reg. v. Antrim Justices, Q.B.D. (Ir.).

2. Diseases of Animals Act—Right to prosecute—Local authority—Diseases of Animals Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 57), ss. 2, 51, 52, 54, 57.—The local authority are not the only persons who have power to enforce the Diseases of Animals Act, 1894, and the orders made in pursuance of the Act. Any person may prosecute for an offence under the Act or orders.

Reg. v. Cubitt, 37 W. R. 492, 22 Q. B. D. 622, distinguished.—Reg. v. Stewart, Burnham, Ex parte, Q.B.D., 368.

3. Jurisdiction—Adulteration—Milk sold with a false warranty—Prosecution of offenders—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 61), ss. 6, 10, 13, 20, 27—Amendment Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 30), s. 3.—K., a Rutlandshire farmer, contracted to sell milk to a dairy company whose premises were situate at Finchley-road, London, but not within the district of the C. metropolitan police court. K. consigned a churn of milk with a written warranty attached to the churn, at Oakham, to the dairy company in the Finchley-road. The dairy company resold the churn of milk to a London hospital whose premises were situate within the district of the C. police court. An inspector of that district procured (under section 3 of the Food and Drugs Act, 1879) at the premises of the hospital, a sample of the milk, and obtained an analysis of it by the analyst of that district, who certified that it was adulterated with water. Proceedings were instituted by the inspector in the C. police court against K. for an offence under section 27 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, by reason of his having given a false warranty as to the milk.

Held, that the magistrate of the C. police court had no jurisdiction, as the offence alleged against K. had not been committed within the district of that court.

Fortune v. Hanson, ante, p. 431, [1896] 1 Q. B. 205, commented on.—Reg. v. Smith (Horace), Q.B.D., 492.

4. Jurisdiction — Child charged with larceny—Charge dismissed—Industrial Schools Act, 1866 (29 & 30 Vict. c. 118), ss. 14, 15.—Where a child has been charged before the justices, and they dismissed the charge, but evidence had been given which, in their opinion, justified them sending the child to an industrial school, they have power to make such an order forthwith, and it is not necessary that the child should be brought before the court again on a fresh summons or warrant.—Reg. v. Jennings, Symons, Ex parte, Q.B.D., 128.

5. Jurisdiction — Licensing Law — Objection to renewal of licence—Refusal of justices to renew—Appeal to quarter sessions—Jurisdiction to order non-appearing objector to pay costs—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49), s. 31, sub-sections 2, 5—Interpretation Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 63), s. 13, sub-section 11.— The licensee of a licensed house received notice of objection to the renewal of his licence, and the objector appeared at the annual licensing meeting and opposed the renewal. The licensing justices refused to renew the licence, and the licensee appealed to the court of quarter sessions, having served due notice of the appeal upon the objector. The objector took no part in the appeal, and did not appear before the court, which allowed the appeal and ordered the objector to pay the costs.

Held, that the court of quarter sessions had jurisdiction to order the objector to pay the costs, as he was a "party" to the appeal within section 31 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, although he had not appeared before the court.—Reg. v. Kent Justices, Q.B.D., 603.

6. Local government — Public Health (London) Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76)—Continuing offence—Limitation of time—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43), s. 11—Amendment—Baines' Act, (12 & 13 Vict. c. 45), s. 7.—On a conviction for wilfully and knowingly acting contrary to an order to close certain premises as unfit for human habitation the magistrate inflicted a fine of a shilling a day for the whole period during which the offence had continued (193) days.

Held, that the conviction was bad as contrary to the six months' limitation of section 11 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848.

Held further, that the conviction could not be amended under section 7 of Baines' Act, since the mistake was not one made in drawing up the conviction, but a mistake of law.—Reg. v. Slade, Q.B.D.

LANDLORD and TENANT:—

1. Building agreement—Covenant—Piece of land for roadway—Maintenance—Acquirement of such land—Whether covenant implied.—Every obligation which on a fair construction of the language of a deed is imposed on one of the parties thereto amounts to an express covenant by him to perform that obligation. But the language must clearly show an intention that there should be an agreement between the covenantor and the covenantee to do or not to do the particular thing referred to. —Cadogan Estate, Re, C.A.

2. Compensation — Allotments — Cottage garden—Holding used by seedsman for trade purposes—Allotments and Cottage Gardens Compensation for Crops Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 26), ss. 4, 5.—A plot of land occupied by a seedsman and used by him for the business of a seedsman is not an allotment or holding within the meaning of section 4 of 50 & 51 Vict. c. 26, and the occupier is not entitled to compensation under section 5. The Act only applies to poor persons who cultivate their gardens for food or pleasure.—Cooper v. Pearse, Q.B.D., 494.

3. Distress — Suspension of right of.—Where a tenant gave his landlord a bill of exchange for rent due:—

Held, that there was evidence to go to the jury of an agreement by the landlord to suspend his right of distress during the currency of the bill.—Palmer v. Bramley, C.A.

4. Ejectment — Forfeiture — Distress — Waiver of forfeiture—Common Law Procedure Act, 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 76), s. 210.—In an action of ejectment under section 210 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, on a right of re-entry for non-payment of rent, the levying a distress after the right of forfeiture has accrued is not a waiver of the forfeiture if after the distress and before the issue of the writ in the action there remains one half-year's rent due.

Brewer v. Eaton, 3 Doug. 230, followed.

Cotesworth v. Spokes, 10 C. B. N. S. 103, distinguished.—Thomas v. Lulham, C.A.

5. Furnished lodgings—Agreement to let—Implied promise—Fitness for occupation—Sanitary condition. —In an agreement to let furnished lodgings and to supply ordinary household attendance there is no implied promise that the lodgings shall be in a sanitary condition throughout the period for which they are let.—Sarson v. Roberts, C.A.

6. Lease—Agreement for lease of colliery—Action for specific performance—Tenant in possession—Order to give up possession—Entry under order—Distress.— In an action by C. for specific performance of an agreement for a lease of a colliery the defendant company, who were in possession and actually working the colliery, were ordered to pay certain arrears of rent, and in default to give up possession to C. Default being afterwards made, the defendant company accordingly gave up possession to C. The question was raised whether C. was entitled to distrain on goods upon the colliery which were admitted to be the property of the debenture-holders of the defendant company, and in the possession of the debenture-holders' receiver.

Held, that C., by taking the above-mentioned order and insisting on his right of taking possession under it, had elected to treat the defendant company as purchasers, and had obtained an equitable remedy inconsistent with the continuance of the relation of landlord and tenant; that C. was now in possession as vendor, and not as landlord; and consequently that the principle of Walsh v. Lonsdale, 31 W. R. 109, 21 Ch. D. 9, did not apply to the case, and C. was not entitled to distrain on the goods.—Murgatroyd v. Old Silkstone Coal Co., CH.D. CHITTY, J., 198.

7. Lease—Covenant not to assign without consent—

—Consent not to be unreasonably withheld—Reasonable grounds for withholding consent.—A lease granted by the plaintiff's predecessor in title contained a covenant by the lessee not to assign without the written permission or licence of the lessor, such permission or licence not to be unreasonably withheld in the case of any respectable and responsible assignee. The plaintiff, being desirous of taking possession for himself, entered into negotiations with the lessee for a surrender of the lease. The lessee offered to sell the lease for £400. The plaintiff did not immediately close with this offer, and in the meantime the lessee agreed to sell the lease to the defendant for £400. The plaintiff, while admitting that the defendant was a respectable and responsible person, refused to give his licence for an assignment of the lease to him, on the ground that he himself was willing to give the sum of £400 for the lease.

Held, that this was not a reasonable ground for withholding consent to the assignment.—Bates v. Donaldson, C.A., 659.

8. Lease—Covenant for title—Covenant for quiet enjoyment—Implied covenants—Word "demise."—In a lease for a term of years there is, in the absence of the word "demise," no implied covenant for title. Where there is an implied covenant for quiet enjoyment, such covenant only operates during the continuance of the lessor's estate.

Decision of Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., 43 W. R. 524, affirmed.—Baynes v. Lloyd, C.A., 328.

9. Lease—Covenant—Restrictive covenant—Not to carry on certain businesses "or any other offensive or noisy trade or profession whatsoever"—Ejusdem generis—Private hospital.—A lease of a plot of ground let for the building thereon of residential houses in a high-class quarter of the City of Dublin contained a covenant on the part of the lessee, his executors, administrators, and assigns not to carry on or permit to be carried on on the demised premises or any part thereof the business of a tavern, soap-boiler, baker, butcher, druggist, apothecary, tanner, silversmith, blacksmith, "or any other offensive or noisy trade, business, or profession whatsoever." The defendant, a sub-lessee of part of the demised premises, used them as a boarding-house for patients needing medical or surgical advice and treatment, but persons suffering from any infectious disease were not received therein.

Held, by the Court of Appeal (Fitzgibbon, L.J., dissenting), that having regard to the locality and the circumstances under which the original lease was granted, the business carried on by the defendant was a breach of the covenant in the original lease, which should be restrained by an interlocutory injunction.

Tod-Heatley v. Benham, 40 Ch. D. 80, and Withington Board v. Manchester Corporation, [1893] 2 Ch. 19, discussed.—Pembroke (Earl) v. Warren, C.A. (Ir.).

10. Lease—Re-entry—Without process of law—Right to relief from forfeiture—Preamble to section 2, 4 Geo. 2, c. 28—Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, ss. 211, 212—Bankruptcy Act, 1883, ss. 44, 168.—In a proper case a lessee is entitled to relief from even forfeiture where the re-entry of the lessor has been a peaceable one and made without process of law.

The effect of the preamble to section 2 of 4 Geo. 2, c. 28, and of section 112 of the Common Law Procedure Act of 1852, is not such as to limit the jurisdiction of the court to grant such relief only in those cases where ejectment proceedings have been taken.

The right to relief from forfeiture is not a right purely personal to the lessee, but vests on his bankruptcy in his trustee in bankruptcy, and may be assigned by such trustee.—Howard v. Fanshawe, CH.D. STIRLING, J.

11. Lease—Residential flats—Common scheme—Implied contract—Injunction.—A general scheme for the management of a set of residential flats conducive to the benefit and convenience of the tenants, and contained in the tenancy agreements, implies a contract on the part of the lessor not to alter the private residential character of the building, and a breach of such implied contract may be restrained by injunction.

Spicer v. Martin, 37 W. R. 689, 14 App. Cas. 12, applied.—Hudson v. Cripps, CH.D. NORTH, J., 200.

12. Lease—Stipulation for payment of additional rent of £3 per ton by way of penalty for every ton of hay or straw sold off the premises—Material difference between manurial value of hay and straw—Penalty—Liquidated damages—Stipulations of varying importance.—A lease of a farm contained a stipulation that the lessee should pay additional rent at the rate of £3 per ton by way of penalty for every ton of hay or straw which should be sold off the premises during the last twelve months of the tenancy. It was proved that there was a material difference between the manurial value of hay and the manurial value of straw.

Held, that the sum of £3 per ton was a penalty, and could not be recovered as liquidated damages.

Wright v. Tracey, 7 Ir. R. C. L. 134, not followed.—Willson v. Love, C.A., 450.

13. Underlease—Covenant to keep in repair—Measure of damages.—In an action for damages on a breach of covenant to keep demised property in repair, the proper measure of damages is the difference in value between the reversion with the covenant performed and the value of that reversion with the covenant unperformed.

In the case of an underlease, if the underlease discloses the fact that it is an underlease, the liability over of the underlessor to his superior landlord is a material circumstance to be taken into account in ascertaining the amount of damages to be paid by the underlessee to the underlessor for breach of covenant to keep in repair.—Ebbetts v. Conquest., C.A., 56.

LANDS CLAUSES ACTS:—

1. Railway company—Notice to treat—Part of a building—"House"—"Manufactory"—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), s. 92.—Where a railway company gives notice to treat for part of a building, another part of which building is used, together with the adjacent land and premises, for the purposes of a manufactory, the company is requiring the sale of a part of the manufactory within the 92nd section of the Lands Clauses Act, and cannot resist a counter-notice calling upon the company to take the whole manufactory.—Brook v. Manchester, Sheffield, &c., Railway Co., CH.D. CHITTY, J.

2. Railway company—Superfluous lands—Pre-emption—Compulsory sale by railway company—Lands Clauses Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), ss. 127, 128.—It is not to be inferred from the compulsory sale by one railway company to another of lands which, if not sold, might have been required for the purposes of the selling company, that the lands are superfluous lands in the hands of that company.

Under the powers of a special Act passed in 1863 the defendants acquired certain lands from the plaintiff's predecessors in title. Under the powers conferred by a special Act passed in 1883 the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co. acquired compulsorily, among other lands, part of the lands acquired by the defendants from the plaintiff's predecessors in title. The Act contained a proviso that the enactment should not affect or prejudice any estate, right, title, interest, or advantage of the plaintiff, his heirs or assigns. The evidence showed that the lands, if they had not been sold to the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co., might have been required for the purposes of the defendants' undertaking.

Held (reversing the decision of Kekewich, J.), that the lands sold to the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co. could not be treated as superfluous lands of the defendants.

3. Reinvestment of purchase money — Rebuilding rectory—Lands Clauses Act, 1845, s. 69.—In 1890 a rector rebuilt the rectory at a time when considerable repairs would otherwise have been necessary. In 1893 some of the glebe was acquired by the Manchester Ship Canal Co., and the purchase money paid into court. Part of the expenses of rebuilding the rectory was still unpaid; on a petition by the rector,

Held, that the sum remaining due could not be paid out of the fund in court.—Newton Heath (Rector), Ex parte, CH.D. NORTH, J., 645.

LICENSING LAW:—

1. Justices—Renewal—Adjournment—Mandamus.—A notice of an application for renewal of a licence, given for the first day of the general annual licensing meeting, holds good for all adjournments.—Reg. v. Armstrong, Q.B.D.

2. Justices—Renewal—Objection—Meeting of justices in private room—Adjournment—Mandamus—Licensing Act, 1828 (9 Geo. 4, c. 61), ss. 1, 3, 9—Licensing Act, 1872 (c. 94), s. 12—Licensing Act, 1874 (c. 49), s. 26.—An application for renewal of a licence was made, and the justices adjourned the consideration of the renewal. Pending the adjournment notice of objection to the renewal was for the first time served on the applicant. The applicant attended at the adjourned hearing and was heard by her solicitor, and the justices refused the renewal.

On an application for a mandamus,

Held, that the objection had been lodged in time, and that as the justices had heard and determined the matter no mandamus would be granted.—Reg. v. Anglesea Justices, Q.B.D.

3. Licence—Renewal—Beerhouse—Mandamus.—In the case of a beerhouse coming within the provisions of section 19 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 27), on an application for a renewal of the licence the magistrates, in the absence of any objection within section 8, have no choice but to grant a renewal without qualification, save where there have been such alterations in the premises since the last renewal as, in the opinion of the justices, destroy the identity of the premises, when they may treat the beerhouse as a new beerhouse, and grant or refuse a new licence for it at their discretion.—Reg. v. Bradford Justices, Q.B.D.

4. Sale of liquor elsewhere than on licensed premises—Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), s. 3.—The appellant held an off licence for the sale of beer by retail. His practice was to employ a carter, who went round to the customers' houses every week with a cart from which he delivered jars of beer and received orders for the following week. The carter in this way received an order from a customer at the customer's own house for a jar of beer, which was the following week delivered from the cart at the house and there paid for. The jar was one of several gallon jars, none of which were distinguished by any label or other mark from other similar jars in the cart.

Held, that the sale of beer to the customer took place at the latter's house and not on the licensed premises, and the appellant was therefore properly convicted under section 3 of the Licensing Act, 1872, of selling intoxicating liquor at a place where he was not authorized by his licence to sell the same.—Pletts v. Campbell, Q.B.D.

5. Sale of drink to drunken person—Sale by barman contrary to orders—Conviction of publican—Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), s. 13.—A publican gave general instructions to his barmen not to sell drink to drunken persons. A barman, in the absence of the publican, sold drink to a drunken person.

Held, that the act of the barman being within the scope of his employment, the publican was liable to be convicted under section 13 of the Licensing Act, 1872, for selling intoxicating liquor to a drunken person.—Police Commissioners v. Cartman, Q.B.D., 637.

6. Sale at place not authorized by licence—Sale—Appropriation of goods sold—Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), s. 3.—A brewer at Burnley, having an off-licence for the sale of beer by retail, sent round a traveller to obtain orders at Accrington. The traveller handed to the customer at whose house he called a printed and stamped post-card, addressed to the brewery; the traveller wrote on the post-card the quantity of ale required, and the customer signed the post-card, which was then posted by the traveller. The post-card contained a request to the brewer to supply the quantity of ale named weekly until further notice, and concluded as follows: "I assent to the appropriation by you to this order at your brewery of goods of the above description and in a deliverable state." The brewer's carter selected at the brewery, in accordance with such an order, six bottles of ale, one of which he labelled with the customer's name and address, and placed them in a coop or box together with six other bottles, for another customer, one of which was also labelled. The goods (with others) were then placed on a lorry, and ultimately delivered at the customer's house, where they were paid for on delivery.

Held, that there had been a complete sale and appropriation of the goods at the brewery at Burnley, and that the brewer could not be convicted under section 3 of the Licensing Act, 1872, of selling intoxicating liquor at a place where he was not authorized by his licence to sell the same.

LIGHT:—

Ancient lights—Prescription Act (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71), ss. 3, 4—Interruption.—An action cannot be brought in respect of a prescriptive right to light unless the access and use of the light has, at the time of action brought, been actually enjoyed for the full period of twenty years without interruption; the fact that, by reason of enjoyment of access of light for more than nineteen, but under twenty years, effectual interruption has become impossible before the completion of the full period, does not make any difference.—Battersea (Lord) v. City of London Sewers Commissioners, CH.D. NORTH, J., 124.

LIMITATIONS, STATUTE of:—

1. Composition—Failure by debtor to pay composition—Action for original debt.—In 1888 the defendant arranged with his creditors (including the plaintiff) for a composition of his debts incurred before 1887, payable by instalments. The first instalment was not paid. On the 28th of October, 1893, the plaintiff brought an action for the amount of the original debt.

Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment; that there was implied in the arrangement made in 1888 a promise on the part of the debtor that in case he failed to pay the composition at the agreed time, he should pay the entire debt; and consequently, that the Statute of Limitations had not barred the debt.—McDonnell v. Broderick, C.A. (Ir.).

2. Money charged on land—Devise of lands charged to tenant for life of charge under a settlement—Presumption of payment of interest by devisee in fee—Real Property Limitation Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 57), s. 8.—A testator, having covenanted to pay within twelve months of his death to the trustees of his son's marriage settlement a sum of money, and having charged certain real estate with payment of the same and interest, devised the estate, subject to the charge, to his son in fee. The son was tenant for life under the settlement, and entered into possession of the estate on the death of his father, and received the rents and profits for more than twelve years. The money had never been raised, nor had any interest ever been paid in fact.

Held, that there had been no payment of interest so as to prevent the Statute of Limitations running in favour of the personal estate.

Decision of Kekewich, J. (43 W. R. 491), affirmed.—England, Re, Steward v. England, C.A., 119.

3. Rent-charge—Non-payment—Extinguishment—Distress—Statute of Limitations (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27), ss. 1, 2, 34.—A rent-charge is a "rent" within the Statute of Limitations (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27), and the owner thereof is barred from the remedy of distress after the right to recover the rent-charge has become extinguished by non-payment during the period limited by the statute.

And the statute is not prevented from running by the fact that the land subject to the rent-charge is in the possession of a statutory corporation.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT:—

1. Arbitration—Differences between district councils—Appointment of arbitrator by Local Government Board—"Other mode of adjustment"—Local Government Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41), ss. 59 (4), and (6) and 62 (2).—In the case of differences between district councils a provision in the order or scheme, under section 57 of the Local Government Act, 1888, that such differences may be adjusted by the county council is not another mode of adjustment within section 62 (2) of that Act. The mode of adjustment contemplated in section 59 (4) is adjustment by the order or scheme itself.—Sowerby District Council and Mytholmroyd District Council's Arbitration, Re, Q.B.D.

2. Arbitration—Paving expenses—Apportionment—Award of arbitrator—Remedy of local authority—Proceedings to enforce award—Jurisdiction of High Court—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 150—Arbitration Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), s. 12.—An award of an arbitrator under section 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875, fixing the proportion of paving expenses payable by an owner of premises to the local authority is not enforceable under section 12 of the Arbitration Act, 1889.—Willesden Local Board v. Wright, C.A., 676.

3. Bye-law—Invalidity—Coal—Sale from vehicle—Requisition to weigh—Weights and Measures Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 21). s. 28.—By a bye-law made by a local authority under section 28 of the Weights and Measures Act, 1889, which enables local authorities to make bye-laws regulating the sale of coal in small quantities, "Every person in charge of any vehicle carrying coal for sale . . . in quantities not exceeding two hundredweight . . . shall re-weigh the coal upon being requested to do so by any purchaser, or by anyone on behalf of the purchaser, or by an inspector of weights and measures, or by any constable."

Held, by Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J. (Wright, J., doubting), that the section authorized the making of a bye-law requiring the coal to be weighed by the person in charge of the vehicle, but held by the court that the bye-law was unreasonable, and therefore bad.—Alty v. Farrell, Q.B.D.

4. Bye-law—Validity—New buildings—Powers of corporation to disapprove of plans—Leeds Improvement Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. ccx.), s. 57—Notice to stop building disregarded—Penalty.—The Corporation of Leeds under the powers given them by certain local improvement Acts made bye-laws relating to new buildings in the city.

Bye-law 61 provided that any person who shall erect a new building without having the plans previously approved of by the corporation shall be liable to a penalty.

C., a building owner, sent in plans, which the corporation, within twenty-one days, gave written notice to C. of their refusal to pass, on the ground, as stated in their notice, that the provisions of section 57, sub-sections (1) and (3), of the Leeds Improvement Act, 1893, would not be complied with by the proposed plan.

C. thereupon commenced to erect the buildings in accordance with the plans, and was summoned by the corporation and convicted under bye-law 61.

Held, that although bye-law 61 purported to give an absolute power to the corporation to sue for a penalty whenever a building was commenced without their previous approval having been obtained, yet, as the corporation had not used that power capriciously, but had stated the grounds for their disapproval, the conviction was right and must be affirmed.—Cook v. Hainsworth, Q.B.D., 541.

5. County council—Bye-law—Validity—Construction—Lights on vehicles—Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), s. 23—Local Government

Act, 1888 (52 & 52 Vict. c. 41), ss. 75, 85.—A bye-law for the good rule and government of a locality made by the local authority ought to be construed so as to give reasonable effect to the object aimed at.

A county council made a bye-law that "a person driving any vehicle shall, from the end of the first hour after sunset to two o'clock a.m., except during such part of that period as shall be between the rising and setting of the moon, carry attached to such vehicle a lighted lamp placed so as to exhibit a light in the direction he is proceeding in order to signal the approach or position of the vehicle; and in case of a vehicle carrying timber, such person shall also carry attached at the end thereof a lighted lamp so as to exhibit a light to persons overtaking the vehicle."

Held, that this bye-law was not bad, either (1) by reason of its throwing on an alleged offender the onus of proving that the alleged offence occurred at a period between the rising and setting of the moon, for that could be proved by means of an almanac; or (2) by reason of the omission in the bye-law of the words "in any street or public place," for those words were to be implied; or (3) by reason of the words "attached to the end thereof" being capable of being construed as applicable either to the vehicle itself or to the timber carried thereon, for those words reasonably construed must be taken as applicable only to the vehicle itself.—Walker v. Stretton, Q.B.D., 525.

6. County council—Bye-law for good rule and government—Use of profane or obscene language—Reasonableness—Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), s. 23—Local Government Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41), s. 16.—A bye-law for the good rule and government of a county made by a county council under section 23 of the Municipal Corporations Act and section 16 of the Local Government Act, 1888, prohibited any person from singing profane or obscene songs or using profane or obscene language "in any street or public place, or on land adjacent therto."

Held, that the bye-law was unreasonable and invalid, not only because it extended the prohibition to land adjacent to a street or public place, but because it did not restrict the offence to cases where the song was sung or the language used to the annoyance of any person or of the public.

A bye-law for good rule and government made under section 23 of the Muncipal Corporations Act, 1882, does not require confirmation by the Local Government Board.—Strickland v. Hayes, Q.B.D., 398.

7. County council—Main roads—Urban district—Maintenance — Contribution — Paved footways — General Turnpike Act (3 Geo. 4, c. 126), ss. 111, 112 —Highways and Locomotives Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 77), ss. 13, 15—Local Government Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41), s. 11.—Where an urban authority claim, under section 11 of the Local Government Act, 1888, to retain the powers and duties of maintaining any main road within their district, the liability of the county council to contribute to the costs of maintaining such road extends to the costs of maintaining the paved footways which run along the side of such road, even though the road was formerly a turnpike road which became a main road on being disturnpiked.

8. Drain—Sewer—Single drain draining several houses—Liability to repair—Public Health Act, 1875 (c. 55), ss. 4, 13, 41—Public Health Act, 1890 (c. 59), s. 19.—A drain pipe passing through private property had, from a date prior to 1890, received the drainage of several houses belonging to different owners before it joined the public sewer. The pipe having become a nuisance, the local authority (who had adopted the Public Health Act, 1890) gave the owners of the houses notice to repair it, and on their failure to do so executed the necessary works themselves, and claimed to recover the expenses from the owners:

Held, that the pipe in question was a "single private drain" within section 19 of the Public Health Act, 1890, and that the local authority was entitled to recover.

9. Highway—District inclosure commissioners with jurisdiction over highways—District council—Transfer of authority—Repair of roads—Mode of raising expenses—Exemption from outside highway rates—Local Government Act, 1894 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 73), ss. 25 and 29.—The expression "highway authority" in the Local Government Act, 1894 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 73), is general, and has not the limited meaning given to the same expression in the Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 77). And highway expenses raised by an acre rate are not defrayed out of any property or funds other than rates within section 29 of the Local Government Act, 1894.

Commissioners of M. had under certain local and private Acts powers of inclosure and drainage, and jurisdiction over the roads in M., a district made up of parts of certain parishes, some of which were in rural and others in urban sanitary districts. Under these Acts the expenses of repairing the roads in M. were raised by an acre rate levied equally on the lands in M., and the lands in M. were exempted from all other highway expenses. The opinion of the court being asked, it was Held, that the commissioners were a highway authority within the Local Government Act, 1894; that their authority as to the roads in the rural district was by section 25 of that Act transferred to the rural district council, their authority as to the roads in the urban district to the urban district council; that the highway expenses of M., after the transfer, were not to be raised by an acre tax, but treated as general expenses under section 29 of the Act, and that the lands in M. were no longer exempted from general highway rates.—Marshland Smeeth Commissioners v. Marshland District Council, Q.B.D.

10. Highway — Encroachment on—Obstruction — Right to abate nuisance—No previous conviction—Urban district council—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 149—Local Government Act, 1894 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 73), s. 26 (1).—An urban district council may remove any obstruction to or encroachment on any highway vested in them by section 149 of the Public Health Act, 1875, without previously taking any proceedings, either by indictment or summarily, against the person who is alleged to have caused the obstruction or encroachment, but they do so at their own risk, and the onus is on them of showing that an obstruction or encroachment did in fact exist.—Reynolds v. Presteign District Council, Q.B.D., 479.

11. Highway — Roadside waste — Obstruction —

Expenses of removal—Local Government Act, 1894, s. 26 (1).—Under section 26 (1) of the Local Government Act, 1894, a local authority is entitled to remove an obstruction to a roadside waste, and can recover the expenses of so doing from the obstructor.—Louth District Council v. West, Q.B.D.

12. Highway — Main road—Footways—Repair—Highways Act, 1878 (c. 77), s. 13—Local Government Act, 1888 (c. 41), s. 11.—Under section 11, sub-section (2) of the Local Government Act, 1888, a county council must pay to the urban authority an annual sum towards the costs of the repair in an urban district of the paved footpaths upon or at the sides of disturnpiked roads, which have become main roads under the Highways Act, 1878, s. 13.

13. Illegal contract—Contract with local authority—No penalty clause—Right of action—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 174 (2).—The Public Health Act, 1875, s. 174 (2), enacts that with respect to contracts made by an urban authority under that Act the contract shall specify some pecuniary penalty to be paid in case the terms of the contract are not duly performed.

Held, that this provision is not directory, but is peremptory. An action will therefore not lie against a local authority for money due under a contract which does not contain a penalty clause.—British Insulated Wire Co. v. Prescot Council, Q.B.D., 224.

14. Nuisance — Abatement — Action by local authority — Consent of Attorney-General — Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 107.—Proceedings by a local authority under section 107 of the Public Health Act, 1875, to enforce the abatement of a nuisance from which the local authority suffers no damage, can only be taken with the consent of the Attorney-General.

Wallasey Local Board v. Gracey, 35 W. R. 694, 36 Ch. D. 593, approved.—Tottenham Urban District Council v. Williamson, C.A., 676.

15. Nuisance — Abatement — Notice served on premises—Right of occupier to recover expenses from owner—Public Health (London) Act, 1891.—Under the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, a sanitary authority served on certain premises an intimation or warning addressed to the owners, that, if certain necessary works were not completed within a specified time, they would commence proceedings against them "by the service of a statutory notice." Thereupon, the occupier, without forwarding the document to the owners, or informing them of it, caused the work to be executed, and then sought to recover the amount expended thereon from the owners. It was decided by Lawrance, J., on the authority of Gebhardt v. Saunders, 67 L. T. Rep. 684, [1892] 2 Q. B. 452, that the owners were liable. On appeal:

Held, that the occupiers, not being compellable to execute the work, had acted as mere volunteers in doing so, and had no claim to be reimbursed by the owners.—Thompson v. Hawes, C.A.

16. Sewer—New buildings and streets—Expenses of sewerage—Refusal of local authority to approve plans—Local Government Act, 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 98), s. 34—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 157, 158, 277.—The owner of land in a rural district in which section 157 of the Public Health Act, 1875, was in force desired to erect upon his land considerable blocks of houses comprising several streets. The bye-laws of the District Council made under section 157, required that the building owner should deposit plans showing, inter alia, "the intended line of drainage of the buildings," and should also deposit "a description in writing of the intended mode of drainage"; the bye-laws did not relate to the provisions for the sewerage of new streets. The owner deposited plans of the proposed new streets and houses, showing in the case of each house a separate drain ending in the soil of a proposed new street, with no cesspool or other receptacle for drainage, and evidently contemplating the existence of a sewer down the proposed street into which the separate drains should empty. The District Council refused to approve the plans, upon the ground only that the owner declined to agree with them for the construction at his expense of the necessary main sewers and sewage outfall works.

Held, that the District Council were not entitled to refuse to approve the plans upon that ground.—Reg. v. Tynemouth District Council, Q.B.D., 646.

17. "Slaughter-house" — "So continued to be used"—Towns Improvement Clauses Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 34), s. 126, and Local Government Act, 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 98).—"Slaughter-house" as used in the Towns Improvement Clauses Act, 1847, and the Local Government Act, 1858, includes not merely the premises where the actual slaughtering of cattle takes place, but also the premises used for processes connected with or incident to the slaughtering; and premises in use for these processes, even though no actual slaughtering of cattle takes place within them, are used as slaughter-houses within section 126 of the Towns Improvement Clauses Act, 1847.

A. was owner of certain premises in Sheffield, which for many years previous to the adoption of the Local Government Act, 1858, by the borough had been used for the slaughter of cattle. In January, 1893, he ceased to slaughter cattle there, but used the premises for "pining" cattle preparatory to slaughter. In March, 1895, he again began to slaughter cattle there. On summons for using as a slaughter-house an unlicensed place, the magistrate held that, as no cattle had been slaughtdred on the premises between January, 1893, and March, 1895, the premises had not been "so used" or "continued to be used as such," within section 126 of the Towns Improvement Clauses Act, 1847, and convicted A. On appeal:

Held, that the conviction was wrong.—Hides v. Littlejohn, Q.B.D.

18. Street—Paving expenses—Schools—Charge on school premises — "Owners" — Trustees — Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 4, 150, 257—Schools Sites Act (4 & 5 Vict. c. 38), s. 6.—The trustees of premises conveyed to them for the purposes of a school under section 6 of the School Sites Act, 1841, are "owners" within section 4 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and the local authority is entitled to a charge on the premises for a proportionate amount of the expenses of paving the street fronting the premises.—Hornsey District Council v. Smith, CH.D. KEKEWICH, J., 559.

19. "Street"—Vestry—Soil below surface—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 149—Tunbridge Wells Improvement Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. ccxxxv.), ss. 4, 93.—Where the Public Health Act, 1875, or any local Act, vests a street in a urban authority, it only vests in them such property in the soil of the street as is necessary for the control, protection, and maintenance of the street as a highway for public use, and confers upon them no authority to make excavations in the soil below the surface for the purpose of public conveniences.

Dictum of Bramwell, L.J., in Coverdale v. Charlton, 4 Q. B. D. 104, explained.

An agreement was entered into between the lord of a manor and the freehold tenants, which was confirmed by a private Act of Parliament, by which it was provided that a certain promenade, formerly part of the waste of the manor, should remain open and free for the public use.

Held, that the soil under the surface of the promenade remained the property of the lord.—Tunbridge Wells (Mayor) v. Baird, H.L.

20. Water-closet — Defective water-closets — Notice requiring owner to amend—Validity of — Public Health (London) Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76), s. 39, sub-section 3; s. 41, sub-section 2.—By the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, s. 39, sub-section 1, the county council are required to make bye-laws with respect to water-closets; and by sub-section 3 any directions given by the sanitary authority under that Act, so far as they are not in accordance with such bye-laws, shall be void. By section 41, sub-section 2, if on examination any water-closet "appears to be in bad order and condition, or to require cleansing, alteration, or amendment," the sanitary authority shall serve a notice on the owner requiring him to put it in proper order or condition. And by sub-section (3) "any person who thinks himself aggrieved by any notice . . . in relation to any water-closet . . . may appeal to the county council, whose decision shall be final."

The county council made bye-laws under section 39 with respect to future water-closets, prescribing the mode of their construction, but made none with respect to structural alterations of existing water-closets.

The respondent was to owner of a water-closet which had been constructed before the making of the bye-laws. The appellants as the sanitary authority, purporting to act under section 41, sub-section 2, served a notice on the respondent requiring him to make certain structural alterations in the water-closet.

Held, (1) that upon a summons for non-compliance with the notice the magistrate had jurisdiction to inquire into the validity of the notice, notwithstanding the provisions as to an appeal to the county council. (2) That the notice was void under section 39, sub-section 3, there being no bye-laws for it to be in accordance with.

Held also, by Kennedy, J., that the "alteration or amendment" which the sanitary authority are empowered to require under section 41, sub-section 2, does not comprise structural alteration.—Fulham Vestry v. Solomon, Q.B.D.

Held, that this was not a lottery within the meaning of the Lottery Acts.—Stoddart v. Sagar, Q.B.D., 287

LUNACY:—

1. Action by committee—Subsequent bankruptcy of lunatic—Trustee in bankruptcy added as defendant—Application by trustee to stay proceedings granted—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 132—Lunacy Act, 1890 (53 Vict. c. 5), ss. 117, 120—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 16, r. 17.—A., the committee of B., a lunatic, commenced an action against C. B. was subsequently adjudicated a bankrupt, whereupon, at the instance of C., the writ was amended by adding B.'s trustee in bankruptcy as a defendant to the action. On an application by the trustee that the action might be stayed as against him on the ground that it was vexatious,

Held, that the right of action vested in the trustee on the bankruptcy of the lunatic; that the trustee could not be added as defendant to the action against his will; and that he was entitled to have the action stayed as against him.—Farnham v. Mitchell, CH.D. STIRLING, J., 135

2. Committee of lunatic's business—Personal liability—Receiver and manager—Committee in position of bailiff or trustee.—A committee appointed by the court to carry on the business of a lunatic cannot be made personally liable on contracts entered into in course of trading, unless it can be shown that the goods were supplied on his credit. He is, therefore, in a different position as regards personal liability to that of a manager and receiver appointed by the court, being in fact merely a bailiff or trustee of the business. In the event of the assets of the business not being for a time available to pay the creditors the committee cannot be compelled to pay them out of his own pocket, repaying himself at a later time from the funds of the business when the assets come to hand.—Isaacs v. Chinery, Q.B.D.

3. Lunatic bankrupt—Jurisdiction—Title of trustee—Creditors—Voluntary settlement—Void gift—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (c. 52), s. 47—Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (c. 71), s. 1—Lunacy Act, 1890 (c. 5), ss. 117, 120.—A lunatic can be adjudicated bankrupt under the direction of his committee with the consent of the Court in Lunacy.

Upon a person being found lunatic the jurisdiction of the Court in Lunacy immediately attaches to his property, including the discretionary powers vested in the court by sections 117 and 120 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, of applying his property for his benefit, and cannot be ousted by a subsequent adjudication in bankruptcy; and consequently the trustee in bankruptcy can only take the lunatic's property subject to the jurisdiction in lunacy.

A voluntary settlement which is "void against the trustee" in bankruptcy of the settlor under section 47 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, is void for all purposes and does not entitle the trustee to stand in the place of the beneficiary so as to defeat a prior title to the settled property—e.g., the jurisdiction of the Court in Lunacy where the settlor has been found lunatic between the date of the settlement and the adjudication in bankruptcy.

Sanguinetti v. Stuckey's Banking Co., 43 W. R., approved.—Farnham, Re (No. 1), LUNACY.

4. Lunatic bankrupt—Property vested in or under the control of trustee in bankruptcy—Jurisdiction of court sitting in lunacy to order transfer.—Where property of a lunatic so found who has also been adjudicated a bankrupt is vested in or under the control of the trustee in the bankruptcy, the court sitting in lunacy has no jurisdiction, upon an application made in lunacy, to order such trustee to transfer that property to the credit of the lunacy.—Farnham, Re (No. 2), LUNACY, 465.

5. Lunatic domiciled in Victoria—Transfer of stock standing in the name of the lunatic—Discretion of the court—Lunacy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 5), s. 134.—A., a person domiciled in Victoria, had been there found a lunatic, and B., the Master in Lunacy of the Supreme Court of Victoria, had been appointed, under the Lunacy Act of Victoria, 1890, to manage A.'s estate. B. applied to the English court to have a transfer to him of the capital and dividends of stock standing in the lunatic's name in England.

Held, that, under section 134 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, the court had a discretion as to making the order, but that, under the circumstances, it was right that both capital and income should be transferred to B.—Brown, Re, LUNACY, 17.

6. Lunatic tenant for life—Conveyance by committee under Settled Land Acts—Covenants for title—Lunacy Act, 1890 (53 Vict. c. 5), s. 124—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), s. 62.—Upon a sale by the committee of a lunatic tenant for life selling under the powers of the Settled Land Act, 1882, the court has power, under section 124 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, to authorize the insertion of such covenants for title as are usual and proper in a conveyance upon a sale.

In re Fox, 35 W. R. 81, 33 Ch. D. 37, explained.—Ray, Re, LUNACY, 353.

7. Lunatic tenant for life—Order in the lunacy for payment of annuities to remainderman for twenty years—Payments erroneously continued beyond that period—Mortgage by and bankruptcy of remainderman—Claim by representative of tenant for life to retain amount of excessive payments—Statute-barred debt—Set-off—Priority.—A tenant for life became lunatic, and by orders in the lunacy made in 1867 and 1868 annuities were directed to be paid to a remainderman (upon proper security for repayment) out of the income of the settled estates for twenty years. The payments were through some unexplained cause continued beyond this period, and in the meantime the remainderman mortgaged his interest in the estates, and subsequently became bankrupt. On the death of the tenant for life, his personal representative claimed to retain out of the share of personal estate, to which the remainderman then became entitled, the amount of the excessive payments beyond the period of twenty years, in priority to the remainderman and all persons claiming under him, together with interest thereon.

Held, that the personal representative was entitled so to retain these amounts together with interest, and that the fact of the estate of the remainderman being in mortgage made no difference.—Langham, Re, Otway v. Langham, CH.D. STIRLING, J.

8. Person lawfully detained—Settled land—Tenant for life—Power of leasing—Exercise of power by receiver duly constituted—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), ss. 6, 62—Lunacy Act, 1890 (53 Vict. c. 5), s. 116, sub-sections 1 (c), 2; s. 120 (h).—The court has power, under sections 116 and 120 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, to authorize the committee of the estate of a lunatic, lawfully detained but not so found by inquisition, to exercise the powers of leasing given to the lunatic as tenant for life of settled land.

9. Person of unsound mind—Detention under law of Belgium — Jurisdiction to appoint receiver — "Lawfully detained"—Lunacy Act, 1890 (53 Vict. c. 5), s. 116 (1) (c).—In the Lunacy Act, 1890, the expression "lawfully detained" means lawfully detained under that Act.

A lady of unsound mind, though not found a lunatic by inquisition, residing in Belgium, was detained as a lunatic according to the law of Belgium. Her father having applied to be appointed to receive the income of stocks standing in her name in this country,

Held, that there was no jurisdiction to make such an order.—Watkins, Re, LUNACY, 609.

10. Practice—Action in name of lunatic—Leave to bring—Jurisdiction of master in lunacy—Lunacy Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 65), s. 27, sub-section 1.—Under section 27, sub-section 1, of the Lunacy Act, 1891, a master in lunacy has jurisdiction to authorize the committee of a lunatic to bring an action in the name of the lunatic, in respect of an alleged breach of trust by the trustees of a will under which the lunatic is a beneficiary, without any confirmation of his order by the judge in lunacy.—Hinchliffe, Re, LUNACY.

MARRIAGE:—

Solemnization by clergyman of the Established Church on board a British warship without licence or banns—Subsequent adultery—Dissolution of marriage.—A marriage between British subjects, solemnized on board an English man-of-war at a foreign station by a clergyman of the Established Church without licence or banns, is valid.

The petitioner, an officer in her Majesty's army, was married in 1884 to the respondent, also a British subject, on board one of her Majesty's ships, then lying at Limasol, in Cyprus, where the petitioner was stationed. The ceremony was performed by the chaplain of the vessel, a clergyman of the Established Church. There had been no publication of banns, and no licence had been obtained.

Held, that there had been a valid marriage according to the common law of this country, and that, upon proof of the respondent's adultery, the petitioner was entitled to a decree nisi for dissolution of the marriage.—Culling v. Culling, P.D. & AD.D.

MARRIED WOMAN:—

1. Deed of settlement by—Acknowledgment—Copyholds—No surrender made—Declaration of trust—Fines and Recoveries Act (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 74), s. 77.—A., a married woman, with the concurrence of her husband, by a deed duly acknowledged made a declaration of trust in respect of certain copyhold hereditaments. No surrender was ever made by A.

On the death of A., her customary heir, B., was duly admitted tenant on the court rolls in her stead.

Held, that the declaration of trust was a disposition within the meaning of section 77 of the Fines and Recoveries Act, and, consequently, that B. was bound by the trusts thereof.—Carter v. Carter, CH.D. STIRLING, J., 73.

2. Reversionary life interest in proceeds of sale of real estate — "Interest in land" — Trust funds invested on mortgage of realty—Fines and Recoveries Abolition Act (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 74), ss. 1, 77.—A married woman's beneficial interest in a sum of money properly invested by her trustees on a mortgage of land conveyed to them, is an "estate" within the meaning of that word as defined in section 1 of the Fines and Recoveries Abolition Act. Consequently the married woman is competent to dispose of her interest in such money by virtue of section 77 of the same Act.

So held by the Court of Appeal (Kay, L.J., dissenting).

In re Newton's Trusts, 23 Ch. D. 181, 32 W. R. Dig. 64, overruled.—Miller v. Collins, C.A., 466.

3. Separate estate — Restraint on anticipation—Arrears of income accrued before judgment—Execution.—Where a married woman was entitled to the income of property for her separate use without power of anticipation,

Held, that arrears of income which had accrued due before the date of a judgment against the married woman, although such arrears had not, at the date of the judgment, actually reached her hands, were liable to be taken in execution.

Decision of the Court of Appeal in Loftus v. Heriot, [1895] 2 Q. B. 212, 43 W. R. Dig. 112, reversed.

Hood Barrs v. Cathcart (No. 2), 42 W. R. 631, [1894] 2 Q. B. 567, and Pillers v. Edwards, 71 L. T. 788, 43 W. R. Dig. 111, overruled on this point.—Hood Barrs v. Heriot (No. 1), H.L., 481.

4. Separate estate—Restraint on anticipation—Discretion of court to remove restraint—Debt to moneylender—Costs of defending criminal proceedings—Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 39.—The court in exercising its discretion under section 39 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, to bind the interest of a married woman in any property notwithstanding that she is restrained from anticipation, has to consider all the circumstances and to balance the undoubted benefit of the restraint against the alleged benefit of its removal.

Married women who have got into debt through extravagance or have gone to moneylenders will not, as a rule, be relieved from the restraint on anticipation.

It is for the benefit of a married woman to defend herself against legal proceedings involving an imputation on her character.—Pollard's Settlement, Re, CH.D. CHITTY, J., 474.

5. Separate estate—Restraint upon anticipation—Judgment—Execution—Arrears of income accruing due after judgment—Receiver.—Where judgment has been obtained against a married woman who is entitled under a settlement to income for her separate use with a restraint upon anticipation, there is no power to appoint a receiver of her income which has accrued due after the date of the judgment.

The decision of the Court of Appeal to the above effect in Hood Barrs v. Cathcart (Nos. 1 and 2), 42 W. R. 628, [1894] 2 Q. B. 559, is not affected by the decision of the House of Lords in Hood Barrs v. Heriot (No. 1), ante, p. 481, [1896] A. C. 174.—Whiteley v. Edwards, C.A., 530.

6. Separate use—Restraint on anticipation—Order binding her interest in fund appointed to her son with her consent — Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 49.—Restraint on anticipation of personalty settled by a married woman on herself for life, with remainder to her husband for life, was removed so as to allow a sum of £500, which she and her husband had appointed to their son, the only child of the marriage, subject to her life interest, to be raised by the trustees of the settlement, and expended in buying cattle and implements of husbandry for the purpose of starting the son as a farmer, and relieving the husband and wife of the expense of maintaining him.—Sawyer's Trusts, Re, M.R. (Ir.).

7. Separate estate—Restraint on anticipation—Probate—Caveat—Action brought against caveator—"Instituting" an action or proceeding—Married Women's Property Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 63), s. 2.—A married woman who enters a caveat in the Probate Registry, and afterwards so insists on her objection to the proving of a will that an action has to be brought against her to have it proved in solemn form, does not "institute" an action or proceeding within the meaning of section 2 of the of the Married Women's Property Act, 1893; and therefore an order cannot be made for payment out of property of the married woman subject to a restraint on anticipation of costs of the action which she may have been ordered to pay.—Moran v. Place, C.A., 593.

8. Separate use—Restraint on anticipation—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), s. 2, sub-section (1); s. 61, sub-sections (2), (6); s. 58, sub-section (1) viii.—Settled Land Act, 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. 18), s. 8—"Settlement"—"Tenant for life."—A married woman entitled in possession under a will to the equitable fee of a share of realty for her separate use without power of anticipation is not a tenant for life, and has not the powers of a tenant for life under the Settled Land Act, 1882, of the share, there being no "settlement" of such share within the definition in section 2, sub-section (1), of the Act.

Section 8 of the Settled Land Act, 1884, enacting that, for the purposes of the Act of 1882, the estate of a tenant by the curtesy is to be deemed an estate arising under a settlement made by his wife, refers to a tenant by the curtesy in possession only.—Bates v. Kesterton, CH.D. CHITTY, J., 150.

9. Separate use—Trustee—Husband taking possession before Married Women's Property Act, 1882, of property settled to separate use of married woman—Notice of trust—Constructive notice—Acquiescence—Trustee Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 99), s. 8.—A husband taking possession before the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, of property coming to his wife under circumstances that should put him on his inquiry as to whether it is settled to her separate use, becomes a trustee of such property for her; and if the husband has retained such property for his own use, neither he nor his executors can rely on section 8 of the Trustee Act, 1888, as a defence.—Wassell, Re, Wassell v. Leggatt, CH.D. ROMER, J., 298.

10. Settlement—Post-nuptial settlement—Covenant to settle after-acquired property—Real estate at law or in equity—Mistake—Relief in court of equity—Fines and Recoveries Act, 1833 (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 74), ss. 1, 77—"Future interests"—Malins' Act (20 & 21 Vict. c. 57), s. 1—Power of Divorce Court to vary settlements—Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Acts (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, s. 45, and 22 & 23 Vict. c. 61, s. 5).—In 1877 a married woman by a deed, separately acknowledged by her, covenanted to settle any real and personal property which might thereafter be devised or bequeathed or descend or devolve to or upon her.

Held, that such covenant was void as to both classes of property, for section 77 of the Fines and Recoveries Act did not apply to that which at the date of the deed of covenant was a mere possibility or expectation at some future time of an estate or interest in land; and Malins' Act (20 & 21 Vict. c. 57) did not apply to a mere expectancy in personal estate; the words in that Act, "every future interest" meaning an interest to which the married woman at the date of the disposing deed has some existing title at law or in equity.

Where, on the 24th of April, 1894, a decree was made by the Divorce Court for the variation of a marriage settlement by reason of the divorce of the wife for adultery, and such decree proceeded upon a common mistake of both the husband and wife as to what property of the wife was comprised in the settlement;

Held, that a court of equity could grant relief to the divorced wife in respect of such mistake, but would only do so upon her undertaking to consent that any application to the Divorce Court under section 45 of the Divorce Act, 1857, for a further settlement upon the husband and child of the marriage, should be dealt with in all respects as if it had been made before the 24th of April, 1894, and was being considered by the court on that day.—Allcard v. Walker, Lucas, Re, CH.D. STIRLING, J., 661.

MARSHALLING.—See WILL, 12.

MASTER and SERVANT:—

1. Apprentice—Compensation for injuries—"Estimated earnings"—Mode of calculating in case of apprentice—Employers' Liability Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 42), s. 3.—An apprentice, when suing his employer under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, for personal injuries, cannot recover, under section 3 of the Act, more than for three years of the wages he is receiving as an apprentice, and in such case the value of the tuition he receives ought not to be included as part of his "earnings" within the meaning of that section for the purpose of increasing the compensation to which he would otherwise be entitled.—Noel v. Redruth Foundry Co., Q.B.D., 407.

2. Confidential employment — Implied contract — Copying list of master's customers—Breach of confidence and trust—Injunction.—The defendant, who was employed by the plaintiff as manager in his business, made a list of the names of the plaintiff's customers from his order-book without the plaintiff's knowledge or authority, with the intention of using it in a rival business after he left the plaintiff's employment, and he did in fact so use it. The plaintiff having claimed damages and an injunction to restrain the defendant from using the list,

Held, that there was an implied term in the contract of service that the servant should act honestly and faithfully towards his master, and that the defendant had committed a breach of that contract, and that damages and an injunction ought to be granted.

Lamb v. Evans, 41 W. R. 405, [1893] 1 Ch. 218, followed.—Robb v. Green, C.A., 25.

3. Confidential relation—Use of information and materials acquired during service—Taking copies from employer's books—Damages—Injunction.—The good faith which exists between an employer and those in his employ renders it illegal, even in the absence of any stipulation to the contrary, for the persons so employed to make use, after the termination of the employment of any materials or any information acquired by them while they were in that confidential relationship; and the court will grant an injunction to restrain such use, in addition to awarding damages.—Louis v. Smellie, C.A.

4. Negligence—"Person in charge or control of locomotive engine or train upon a railway"—Employers' Liability Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 42), s. 1, sub-section 5.—The Employers' Liability Act, 1880, by section 1, sub-section 5, enacts that where personal injury is caused to a workman by reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer "who has the charge or control of any . . . locomotive engine or train upon a railway," there shall be the same right of compensation against the employer as if the workman had not been in his service.

A "person who has the charge or control of a train" does not necessarily cease to have charge of it, within the meaning of the Act, because some of the carriages are uncoupled from one another and from the engine in order that they may be separately dealt with. And those words do not necessarily point only to one person who is in charge of the whole train, but may include persons who have duties to perform in respect of parts of the train.

An engine-driver, employed with his fireman in the discharge of loaded wagons on a railway, took a locomotive engine and several wagons to a point on an incline, and there proceeded with the engine and one of the wagons to the place of discharge, intending to return for the other wagons in due course. The fireman uncoupled the remaining wagons and scotched them to prevent them running down the incline. One of the wagons broke away, ran down the incline, and killed a workman in the service of the same employers. There was evidence that the method of scotching adopted was unsafe, and was known to and approved by the engine-driver. The representative of the deceased having brought an action for compensation against the employers:

Held, reversing the decision of the Queen's Bench Division and the Court of Appeal, that there was evidence for the jury that the death was caused by reason of the negligence of a person who had the charge or control of a train within the meaning of the Act, since either the engine-driver had the charge or control, or the fireman had, and there was evidence of negligence in both.—McCord v. Cammell, H.L.

5. Shop—Employment of young person in—Employment partly in shop and partly outside—Employment "in or about shop"—Shop Hours' Act, 1892, (55 & 56 Vict. c. 62), s. 3.—When a young person is employed in a shop, and when his employment is partly inside the shop and partly outside the shop, the time occupied in the outdoor employment is time occupied "in or about the shop" within the meaning of section 3 of the Shop Hours' Act, 1892; and the time so occupied in the outdoor employment when added to the time of employment in the shop itself cannot, in any one week, exceed the limit of seventy-four hours laid down in that section.—Collman v. Roberts, Q.B.D., 445.

6. Ship—Seaman—Wages—Contract of Service—Increased Danger — Uncompleted Voyage. — The J. Government bought a warship in E. which they placed in charge of a master to navigate to J. O. contracted with the master to serve as one of the crew for the voyage for a fixed sum. During the voyage the J. Government declared war against C., and O. then refused to continue to serve, and left the ship.

Held, that the master was responsible for the act of his principals in declaring war, and that as the risks of O. were increased, O. was justified in abandoning the voyage, and was entitled to the stipulated sum notwithstanding that the voyage was not completed,—O'Neil v. Armstrong, C.A.

MERGER:—

Charge—Tenant for life of estate subject to charge—Bequest of charge to tenant for life—Intention.—Where an owner in fee of real estate becomes owner of a charge, the latter is primâ facie merged unless there is either an expressed intention to the contrary by the fee simple owner, or an implied intention to the contrary by reason of the owner in fee having an interest in keeping the charge alive.

But where a tenant for life only becomes by bequest owner of a charge on the estate, the charge is primâ facie unmerged and is capable of being raised by the executor of the tenant for life. But this primâ facie presumption of non-merger can be rebutted by evidence of intention on the part of the tenant for life that the charge should merge in the inheritance.—Godley's Estate, Re, CH.D. (Ir.).

METROPOLIS MANAGEMENT:—

1. Building—Buildings to be carried out under a contract—London Building Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 213), s. 212.—The provision in section 212 of the London Building Act, 1894, which exempts from compliance with its requirements buildings to be carried out under any contract entered into before the Act, includes buildings to be carried out under a building agreement made for the development of an estate.—Tanner v. Oldman, Q.B.D., 63.

2. Building—General line of buildings—"Building, structure, or erection"—Wall and advertisement hoarding—Appeal from architect's certificate—Issue of summons—Metropolis Local Management Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102), s. 75.—The appellants were the owners of a house the forecourt of which had for many years been bounded by a dwarf wall between 2 and 3 feet high, with an iron railing upon it 5 feet 6 inches high. Upon this wall the appellants erected a hoarding for advertisements, which was removed in consequence of a notice from the London County Council. The appellants then replaced the old wall by a new wall 11 feet high and 14 inches thick, to act as a screen for advertisements. A summons was taken out by the London County Council charging the appellants with having erected a structure beyond the general line of buildings, contrary to section 75 of the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1862. The summons was taken out before the superintending architect had given his decision as to the general building line, and was heard by the magistrate while that decision was still under appeal. The magistrate ordered the demolition of the wall.

Held, that the magistrate had jurisdiction to deal with the summons, and that the appellants' new wall was a "building, structure, or erection" within section 75 of the Act.—Lavy v. London County Council, C.A.

3. Buildings, general line of—Site of old building—Land occupied with house—New street—Metropolis Management Amendment Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102), ss. 74, 75.—A new street was formed in the metropolis, opening at a right angle into an existing street, in which there was a contiuous row of houses with forecourts in front and gardens behind. The plan for the new street submitted to the London County Council contained a note stating that two of the above-mentioned houses were (among others) to be pulled down, and the new street, as shown by the plan, occupied the whole site of one of them with the forecourt and garden belonging thereto, and part of the site of the other and of the forecourt and garden belonging thereto, which were respectively forty-eight and ninety feet in depth. These houses having been pulled down, the owner of the last-mentioned of them was erecting on so much of its site and the forecourt and garden on each side of it as was not thrown into the new street a block of buildings fronting to the new street, which projected beyond the general line of buildings in that street as fixed by the superintending architect of the county council.

Held, that he was not building on the site of a previously existing building within the meaning of section 74 of the Metropolis Management Amendment Act, 1862, and therefore was infringing the provisions of section 75 of that Act, which forbids the erection of buildings beyond the general line of buildings in the street.

Lord Auckland v. Westminster District Board of Works (L. R. 7 Ch. 597) distinguished.—London County Council v. Pryor, C.A.

4. Building—Party wall—Wall extending above adjoining building—Wall dividing a building of the warehouse class extending to more than 250,000 cubic feet—London Building Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. ccxiii.), ss. 59 (1), 75.—By the London Building Act, 1894, s. 75, it is enacted that buildings of the warehouse class above a certain size shall be divided by party walls.

Held, that it was not intended that a wall which was a party wall for the purposes of the section up to a certain height should necessarily continue to be a party wall above that height, so as to be subject, as to the upper portion, to the provisions of the Act with regard to party walls.—Drury v. Army and Navy Co-operative Society, Q.B.D., 560.

4*a*. House Refuse—Removal of—Refusal to allow scavengers to enter house for removal of refuse—"Wilful obstruction"—Public Health (London) Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76), ss. 16, 30, 31, 116.—Under the provisions of section 16 of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, the London County Council made a bye-law that the sanitary authority should remove at least once in every week the house refuse on premises within their district, but they had made no bye-law as to the duties of occupiers of houses for the purpose of facilitating the removal of such refuse, and an authority under this bye-law appointed a certain day in each week for the removal of such refuse, and gave due notice of the same. The respondent objected to the weekly removal of refuse as being an unnecessary annoyance, and on a certain day he refused to allow the scavengers of the authority to enter his house for the purpose of removing the refuse.

Held, that the respondent, in so refusing, was guilty of "wilfully obstructing" the officers of the authority in the execution of the Act within the meaning of section 16 of the Act, and was liable to the penalty imposed by that section—Borrow v. Howland, Q.B.D.

5. Sewer—Drain—Combined drain—Pipe draining

two houses—Disconnection of one of the houses—Nuisance—Liability of Vestry—Metropolis Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), ss. 68, 69, 250.—A pipe, prior to 1895, drained two houses. It was not proved when the combined drain was constructed, or that it was made under the order of the Vestry. In 1895, in compliance with a notice of the Vestry complaining of a nuisance, the owner of one of the houses cut off his drainage from the pipe in question, which thereupon only drained one instead of two houses. Shortly afterwards the respondent, who was the owner of the other house, received a notice from the Vestry under section 4 of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, stating that a nuisance existed, and requiring him to abate it. Upon the respondent refusing to comply with this notice, the Vestry took out a summons against him.

Held, that the pipe in question was, prior to 1895, a sewer, not a drain; that when once a pipe becomes a sewer it always remains a sewer; that such sewer remained vested in the Vestry, there being no statutory provision divesting them of it; and consequently, that the Vestry, not the respondent, was bound to abate the nuisance.—St. Leonard's, Shoreditch Vestry, v. Phelan, Q.B.D. 427.

6. "Sewer"—"Drain"—Combined system of drainage—Connection with drain made without authority—Nuisance—Metropolis Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), s. 250—Public Health (London) Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76), s. 2.—By section 250 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, a drain which, without an order of the sanitary authority, drains more than one house is a sewer; and by the same Act the duty of repairing sewers lies upon the local authority.

A sanitary authority approved a combined system of drainage submitted by a building owner in respect of certain semi-detached houses about to be built by him, by which each pair of houses was to drain by one drain into the sewer. In building the houses the building owner departed from his scheme, and drained four houses into one drain. Subsequently the houses were sold without any notice to the purchasers as to the system of drainage. The purchaser of one of the houses was summoned for not complying with a notice under section 1 of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, requiring him to abate a nuisance arising from defective drainage at his premises.

Held, that the part of the drain which received the drainage of the other three houses was a sewer, and that the purchaser was not estopped by the default of the building owner from disputing his liability to repair that part of the drain.—Kershaw v. Taylor, C.A., 28.

7. Sewer—Drain—Liability to repair—Combined system of drainage—Drain made without order of vestry—Metropolis Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), ss. 68, 69, 250.—The fact that a sewer has been unlawfully made does not prevent it vesting in the vestry or district board of works under section 68 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, so as to become repairable by them under section 69.

A drain for draining a group of houses by a combined operation was made without an order of the vestry:

Held, that the drain so made was a "sewer" within the definition in section 250 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, so as to vest in and be repairable by the vestry.

Decision of the Divisional Court, ante, p. 559, affirmed.—Reg. v. St. Matthew, Bethnal Green, Vestry, C.A., 697.

8. Sewers—London County Council—Power of county council to order vestries to construct sewers—Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 170), s. 138.—The London County Council have no power, under section 138 of the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855, to order the vestry of a parish in the metropolis, in which parish certain houses are situate which discharge their sewage directly into the River Thames, to construct a new sewer for the purpose of receiving the drainage of such houses and preventing its discharge into the river.—Reg. v. St. George, Hanover Square, Vestry, Q.B.D., 16.

9. Street—Erection of buildings with quadrangle in centre—Quadrangle for use of tenants only—Sanction of London County Council—"Laying out street for carriage traffic"—London Building Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. ccxiii.), s. 7.—The appellant, who was the owner of a site where formerly a brewery business had been carried on by him, resolved to use the ground for building, and he accordingly erected, fronting on the public street, a building with shops on the ground floor and flats above, and with an archway through the middle of the ground floor. He afterwards proposed to build round the other three sides of the quadrangle formed by clearing away the old houses, and when the buildings would be completed there would be forty-two flats with a quadrangle or courtyard in the centre from which there would be two staircases to the flats. There would be no exit or entrance to or from the quadrangle except by the archway, which was closed by an iron gate, and the quadrangle would be for the use only of the tenants of the flats and those visiting them, and the public would be entirely excluded from it.

Held, that this quadrangle was not a "street" within the meaning of section 7 of the London Building Act, 1894, and that the appellant, in commencing to lay out the quadrangle, had not "commenced to form or lay out a street for carriage traffic" within the meaning of that section, and did not, therefore, require the previous sanction of the London County Council.—Wood v. London County Council, Q.B.D., 144.

10. Street—New street—Paving expenses—Apportionment—Owners of land—Discretion of local authority—Metropolis Management Amendment Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102), s. 77.—A vestry or district board, in apportioning the expenses of paving a new street, under section 77 of the Metropolis Management Amendment Act, 1862, has a discretion, if it thinks fit, to charge particular owners of land in a less proportion than other owners of land.—Metropolitan District Railway Company v. Fulham Vestry, C.A., 53.

11. Street—New street—Road with houses on one side only—Widening of road—New Footpath—Cost of paving—Apportionment—Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), s. 105.—In 1870, a road, which was then an unpaved "new street," with houses and a footpath on the north side only, and vacant land on the south side, was paved to the satisfaction of the local authority under the provisions of section 105 of the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855. The expenses of such paving were apportioned upon and were paid wholly by the owners of the houses on the north side, and the vestry afterwards kept the whole of such pavement in repair, and paid the cost out of the general rates. In 1888 the owner of the vacant land on the south side, by an arrangement with the vestry for widening the road, set back his fence 13 feet, and dedicated this strip, and the vestry kerbed a new footpath 7 feet in width on the south side, and paved and metalled the remaining 6 feet, making it uniform with the carriage-way already paved, and they paid the expenses, as well as the expenses of the subsequent repairs, out of the general rates.

The only part left unpaved was the new footpath of seven feet, and, houses having been built on the south side of this footpath, the vestry resolved in 1894 to pave this footpath, being, as they said, a "new street," and they apportioned the expenses of paving the new footpath on the owners on the north side of the road as well as on the owners on the south side.

Held, that the apportionment was upon a wrong basis; that, as in 1870, the whole breadth of the road was completely paved to the satisfaction of the local authority under section 105, and as they had exercised their powers under the section, and compelled contribution from the owners of the houses adjoining, they had no jurisdiction afterwards to declare this road a "new street," and that the only "new street" was the new footpath which formed no part of the old road, and that, as the houses on the north side did not abut on this new footpath, the owners of such houses could not be called upon to contribute to the expenses of paving the same.—White v. Fulham Vestry, Q.B.D.

12. "Street, place, or row of houses" in which building situate—Determination of—Superintending architect—Magistrate—Metropolis Local Management Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102), s. 75.—For the purposes of section 75 of the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1862, it is the function of the superintending architect, and not of the magistrate, to determine the question in what "street, place, or row of houses" a building is situated.

MORTGAGE:—

1. Building society — Statutory receipt — Reconveyance—Mistake discovered after mortgage vacated—Building Societies Act, 1874 (c. 42), s. 42.—Where the mortgagor of a building obtained a statutory receipt upon the deed of mortgage that he had redeemed the mortgage; and the society had made a mistake against themselves, in the amount to be paid by him in order to redeem:

Held, that in the absence of fraud the society could not recover the balance, or re-open the mortgage account.—London and County United Building Society v. Angell, Q.B.D.

2. Consolidation — Redemption — Assignment of mortgages to one person.—In 1863, Banks mortgaged Nos. 1 and 2 to J.; later on, in 1863, No. 3 to H.; and in 1865-1866, Nos. 4, 5, 6, and 7 to other mortgagees. Afterwards, in 1866, Banks made a second mortgage to Brockman of 4, 5, 6, and 7; and in 1868 he made a second mortgage of 1, 2, and 3, and a third mortgage of 4, 5, 6, and 7 to Brockman and Harrison. The appellant became the transferee from Brockman and Harrison of their equity of redemption of all the seven properties in 1885. The respondents (the executors of Brockman) held the first mortgage on Nos. 1, 2, 4, and 5, by transfers to their testator (1871 to 1873), and by transfer in 1890 they also held the first mortgage on No. 3.

Held, in an action by the appellant seeking to redeem No. 2 alone, that the respondents were entitled to consolidate their mortgages on all the seven properties.

Decision of the Court of Appeal, 43 W. R. 50, [1895] 1 Ch. 51, affirmed.

Vint v. Padgett, 6 W. R. 641, 2 De G. & J. 611, approved.

Per Lord Davey.—The doctrine of consolidation is applicable where, at the date when redemption is sought, all the mortgages are united in one hand and redeemable by the same person; or where, after that state of things has once existed, the equities of redemption have become separated.—Pledge v. White, H.L., 589.

3. Equitable charge on land—Locke King's Amendment Act, 1877 (c. 34), s. 1.—Where land is made security for a debt by any instrument which gives to the person entitled to the charge an equitable interest in the land, such instrument creates an equitable charge within the meaning of Locke King's Amendment Act, 1877.—Sharland, Re, Kemp v. Rozey (No. 2), C.A.

4. Mortgagee in possession — Repayment — Six months' notice or interest.—A mortgagee who takes possession is not entitled to notice or interest in lieu of notice, when the principal interest and costs have been tendered, even though the tender is before the day fixed for payment in the deed, as entry into possession is equivalent to a demand for payment.—Bovill v. Endle, CH.D. KEKEWICH, J., 523.

5. Power of sale—Mortgage by tenants in common—Sale by private tender to one of mortgagors for exact amount of mortgage debt — Other mortgagors not informed of sale—Validity of sale.—A mortgagee is not a trustee of a power of sale for the mortgagor, and is entitled to look after his own interests first, provided that he does not fraudulently, wilfully, or recklessly sacrifice the property of the mortgagor.

A sale under the ordinary power of sale in a mortgage was made by the mortgagee, by private contract to one of several of the mortgagors, at a price exactly equal to the amount of the principal interest and costs, but without the knowledge or consent of the other mortgagors;

Held, that such a sale was not necessarily invalid; and it appearing that an out and out sale was in fact intended, and that the mortgagee had previously given all the mortgagors the fullest opportunity of obtaining a transfer of the mortgage or of selling, if they could, the transaction was upheld as a valid sale to—not a mere redemption by—one of the several mortgagors.

(Limited), 37 W. R. 196, 40 Ch. D. 395, explained. Kennedy v. De Trafford, C.A., 454.

6. Practice — Foreclosure — Judgment — Account — Special circumstances.—Any special matter affecting the state of the account as between mortgagor and mortgagee in a foreclosure action should be brought forward at the trial, and the judgment should direct the chief clerk to have regard to any such matter specifically.

Where the common account was directed in a foreclosure judgment, and there was no special direction to the chief clerk,

Held, that it was not open to the mortgagor on the taking of the ordinary account to bring forward for the first time a claim to redeem on payment of the amount at which the mortgagee had valued his security in the mortgagor's bankruptcy, and that a summons to vary the certificate by the addition of a finding of the claim to redeem must be dismissed. —Sanguinetti v. Stuckey's Bank, CH.D. CHITTY, J., 309.

7. Priority—Equitable mortgage by deposit—Subsequent mortgage by deed registered—Priority—Actual fraud—Yorkshire Registries Act, 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. 5), ss. 3, 7, 14.—The expression "actual fraud" used in section 14 of the Yorkshire Registries Act, 1884, means fraud in the ordinary popular acceptation of the term.

A. acted as solicitor on behalf of B. in arranging that D. should deposit with a bank the deeds relating to certain property in Yorkshire for the purpose of indemnifying B. against an overdraft at the bank. The deposit was made, but not registered. Subsequently A. took from D. a mortgage by deed of the same property, and, having registered such mortgage, claimed priority against the mortgage by deposit to the prejudice of B.

Held, that if A.'s claim to priority were allowed he would be guilty of actual fraud towards B., and that consequently he ought not to obtain such priority.—Hobson, Re, Battison v. Hobson, CH.D. STIRLING, J., 615.

8. Priority—Fraud—Trust for sale—Conveyance obtained by fraud—Receipt in body of deed—Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), ss. 54, 55, 2 (viii.).—Real property worth about £700, which belonged to H., who died in October, 1892, was at that time subject to a legal mortgage made by him to a building society. H. devised the equity of redemption to N. upon trust for sale. C., the solicitor who acted for the society, and also for H., and for N. after H.'s death, fraudulently represented to the society that notice had been given to pay off the mortgage, and procured the statutory receipt for the mortgage money to be indorsed upon the deed pursuant to section 42 of the Act of 1874. The receipt was dated December, 1892. C. obtained the deed thus indorsed, but neither C. nor the society ever received the money. About the 29th of December, 1892, C. deposited with the plaintiffs, as security for £650 advanced to him, all the title deeds except the mortgage to the society, which was not disclosed by the deposited deeds. They included a conveyance of the property to C., which C. on the 29th of December, 1892, obtained from N. This purported to be in pursuance of a contract for sale by N. to C., but the consideration money was never in fact paid.

Held, that the society had not parted with the legal estate, which still remained in them as security, and in respect of that legal security the society had priority over the plaintiffs.

Held, also, that the plaintiffs were entitled to rely on the receipt for the consideration money in the body of the conveyance of the 29th of December, 1892, in accordance with sections 54 and 55 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, and therefore had priority in equity over N. and his cestuis que trustent.

9. Receiver — Company mortgagee—Mortgagee in possession—Appointment of director of mortgagee company as receiver—No allowance for fees for collection of rents.—The defendant company, who were mortgagees, had gone into possession of the mortgaged property, and appointed one of their directors to collect the rents as their agent.

Held, that the director could not be allowed any commission for collection out of the rents.—Kavanagh v. Working Man's Benefit Building Society, C.A. (Ir.).

10. Sale—Purchase of mortgaged property—Payment off by purchaser of incumbrance—Intention to keep alive incumbrance—Presumption.—Where a purchaser of a property pays off a mortgage on it without showing an intention to keep it alive, still, if its continuance as an existing charge is beneficial to him, it will be treated in equity as subsisting unless an intention to the contrary can be inferred from the terms of the purchase deed or from other legitimate evidence. But the opportunity of making a very doubtful claim against third parties is not such a benefit as is meant in this enunciation of the doctrine. Further, if an intention to keep alive a charge on property is inconsistent with the real intention of the parties to the deed by which the property was assigned to the purchaser, the charge cannot be treated as still subsisting simply because the purchaser afterwards finds it would have been better for him to have kept the charge alive.

So held, by Lindley and A. L. Smith, L.JJ. (Kay, L.J., dissenting), affirming the decision of North, J.

Toulmin v. Steere, 3 Mer. 210, questioned.—Liquidation Estates Purchase Co. v. Willoughy, C.A., 612.

11. Settlement—Charge on inheritance—Payment by tenant for life—Presumption of intention for own benefit—Relation of parent and child.—The fact that the relationship of parent and child exists between a tenant for life and remaindermen, though not immaterial, is not of itself sufficient to rebut the presumption that a tenant for life who pays off a charge upon the inheritance intends to keep the charge alive for his own benefit, and not for the benefit of the remaindermen.—Harvey, Re, Harvey v. Hobday, C.A., 242.

NEGLIGENCE :—

1. Gas company—Explosion—Evidence.—Excavations made by Commissioners of Sewers within two and a half feet of a gas main laid at a depth of ten and a half inches under a highway, caused one of the gas pipes to be deprived of support, and the weight of the traffic above thereupon cracked the pipe, resulting in an escape and explosion of the gas, which explosion injured a person in the street. The gas company did not in fact know of the escape of the gas nor of the excavation made by the Sewer Commissioners.

Held, that the character of the crack in the pipe, the length of time the gas was escaping, and the absence of anyone on behalf of the gas company at the excavation, were evidence of negligence on the part of the gas company.—Price v. South Metropolitan Gas Co., Q.B.D.

2. Lease—Surrender—Prior equitable mortgage—Notice—Priority.—A lessee who had deposited his lease by way of equitable mortgage with B. afterwards by deed surrendered the term to the lessor. The surrenderee at the time of surrender had asked the lessee to deliver up the instrument of lease, and was falsely informed by the lessee that he had left it with a friend, but that he (the lessee) had neither assigned nor charged his interest, nor pledged the instrument of lease. The surrenderee had no actual notice that the lease had been deposited by way of mortgage with B.

Held, that the surrenderee had not, under these circumstances, been guilty of gross or wilful negligence, and was consequently entitled, as the holder of the legal estate, to priority over B., the prior equitable mortgagee.

3. Principal and agent—District council—Contractor — Damage — Remoteness. —A district council employed a contractor to construct a sewer in a public thoroughfare. The contractor in constructing the sewer negligently left a gaspipe in use unsupported, so that the pipe broke, and gas escaped therefrom into the plaintiffs' house, and an explosion occurred, whereby the plaintiffs suffered damage.

Held, that there was a duty on the district council to so construct the sewer as not to cause damage to the public; that the district council might delegate that duty to a contractor, but if the contractor failed to perform the duty, the district council were liable for the damage resulting from such failure.

Held, also, that the damages claimed were not too remote.—Hardacre v. Idle District Council, C.A., 323.

4. Public body—Nonfeasance—Liability to an individual under a contract—Deposit of goods for safe custody—Inspection of premises—Risk of injury to goods—Duty of bailee.—The principle of exemption from liabilities afforded to public bodies for mere nonfeasance, as enunciated in Municipality of Pictou v. Geldert, 42 W. R. 114, [1893] A. C. 524, and other cases, has no application to a case in which the parties charged with the nonfeasance are under obligations to an individual member of the public to perform the duty, which they have neglected to his prejudice, in consideration of their being remunerated by him for its performance.

A depositor of goods for safe custody, who by himself or his servants has had an opportunity of observing defects in the storehouse, incurs no obligation from this circumstance, for he is entitled to rely upon the care and skill of his paid bailee.—Brabant v. King, P.C., 157.

5. Railway company—Level crossing—Contributory negligence.—The plaintiff's husband was killed by a train at a level crossing on the defendants' line. The crossing was one for vehicles, and also for foot passengers. A man was stationed there by the defendants, and occupied a cottage close to the crossing. It was the duty of this man to go out and signal the trains as they passed, to show that the line was clear. The plaintiff's husband, who was acquainted with the man and lived in the neighbourhood, called at the cottage, and almost immediately after he left it was run over and kille by a passing train. The man gave no warning to the plaintiff's husband that a train was approaching, and did not go out to signal the train. There would have been no statutory duty for the defendants to have a man at the crossing if it had been a crossing for foot passengers only.

Held, that there was evidence to go to the jury of negligence on the part of the defendants.

Held, also, that there was evidence from which the jury might infer that the plaintiff's husband had not been guilty of contributory negligence, and that the evidence was not such that the circumstances were equally consistent with the accident having been caused by the plaintiff's husband's negligence as by the defendants'.—Smith v. South-Eastern Railway Co., C.A., 291.

NEW SOUTH WALES, LAW of:—

1. Bye-laws—Construction—Levying water-rate—Lands outside rateable limits—Act XXVII. of 1892, s. 35.—Where the appellants were authorized by their incorporating Act (XXVII. of 1892), s. 35, to make bye-laws levying a water-rate "in respect of lands and tenements distant not more than sixty yards from any main . . . although such lands or premises are not actually connected with any main":

Held, that they had no authority to levy a rate on lands without the prescribed limit merely because such lands formed one holding with other lands within the prescribed limit.—Hunter District Water Board v. Newcastle Coal Co., P.C.

2. Parliamentary allowances to members—53 Vict. No. 12, s. 2.—On the true construction of the Parliamentary Representatives Allowance Act (53 Vict. NEWSPAPER:—See CONTEMPT; LOTTERY; PRACTICE, 19.

NONFEASANCE:—See NEGLIGENCE, 4.

NUISANCE:—

1. Noise—Lawful trade—Character of neighbourhood.—The defendants had, since July, 1894, carried on the business of newspaper forwarding agents at premises in the City of London. The plaintiffs were respectively the leaseholders and the part occupiers of certain residential premises erected in 1886, and which were opposite to the defendants' premises. The occupying plaintiffs and others of the tenants of the plaintiffs' premises had been so disturbed by the noise of the defendants' carts and the shouts of their drivers and other of the defendants' employees between 2 a.m. and 6 a.m. that they were in many cases unable to sleep; and some of the plaintiffs' tenants had in consequence left and others had threatened to leave.

Held, that the defendants' business had caused a nuisance by noise so continuous and of such a character as to entitle the plaintiffs to an injunction. —Bartlett v. Marshall, CH.D. ROMER, J., 251.

2. Public Health—Overcrowding in a house—Premises—Inmates—Public Health (London) Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76), s. 2.—The chief officer in charge of a Salvation Army shelter was summoned by the local sanitary authority under section 2 of the London Public Health Act, 1891, for non-abatement of a nuisance caused by the overcrowding of the shelter, so as to be injurious or dangerous to the health of the inmates. A magistrate made an order for abatement. In the notice served by the local authority, as also in the summons and the magistrate's order, the shelter was not described as a "house" (the word used in the Act), but as "premises."

Held, that the notice, and the summons and order made thereon, were substantially in accordance with the words of the Act.

PARTNERSHIP:—

1. Accounts—New partnership—Concealed fraud—Statute of Limitations.—A father carried on business in partnership with his two sons A. and B. from 1856 until the father's death in 1886, without articles of partnership. On the father's death the partnership accounts were signed by A. and B. for probate, and they continued the partnership, sharing profits equally, on the same terms as before. A. died in 1893, and his executrix brought an action against the surviving partner B. to wind up the affairs of the partnership, and for an account since 1886, the date of the death of the father. B., by way of defence, alleged concealed fraud on the part of A., and counter-claimed for an account from 1870, the date of A.'s marriage, when a fresh arrangement was made by the partners as to their shares, and if necessary from 1856, the commencement of the partnership; the Statute of Limitations was thereupon relied on by the plaintiff by way of defence to the counter-claim.

Held (reversing the decision of Wright, J.) that, the concealed fraud having been proved, the Statute of Limitations commenced to run only from the time when the concealed fraud had been in fact discovered, and could not be set up as a defence to the counter-claim.

It is the duty of a partner to trust his co-partner without examining the partnership books to ascertain if any fraud is being committed.

2. Arbitration clause—Action for dissolution—Application to stay—Jurisdiction—Arbitration Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), s. 4.—Where articles of partnership contain an arbitration clause providing in effect for the reference of all matters in difference between the parties, such a clause covers a claim for dissolution of the partnership, and the arbitrators can, if they think fit, award a dissolution.

Where, therefore, in such a case, an action is brought by one of the partners for dissolution of the partnership, the judge may, in the exercise of his judicial discretion, order a stay under section 4 of the Arbitration Act, 1889.

Walmsley v. White, 40 W. R. 675, followed.—Vawdrey v. Simpson, CH.D. CHITTY, J., 123.

3. Brewery business—Death of one partner—Purchase of business by surviving partner—Valuation—Tied public-houses—Goodwill.—Two persons carried on the business of a brewery for twenty-one years under partnership articles, which provided that, on the death of a partner without nominating a son to succeed him (which event happened), the property, stock, goods, and effects were to be valued, and the surviving partner was to have the option to purchase at such valuation.

The partnership was continued upon the same articles by a deed of covenant for a further period of seven years and afterwards without any written or verbal agreement.

One partner died, and the surviving partner exercised his option to purchase the business at the valuation.

Held, that, in taking such valuation, the goodwill of the business ought to be valued separately (except so far as it related to tied public-houses forming part of the partnership property at the death of the partner) on the footing of the surviving partner being at liberty to carry on the business.

4. Goodwill—Vendor and purchaser—Making list of customers with view to use after expiration of partnership—Injunction.—Although a person who has sold the goodwill of his business is not thereby precluded from starting a similar business, yet he is not at liberty to solicit custom from the old customers specifically. And this is equally so when partners have agreed that the goodwill shall on the expiration of the partnership belong exclusively to one of the partners.

5. Managing partner—Authority—Action against firm—Solicitor—Entering appearance in names of partners—Duty of solicitor—Information to partners of progress of action—Negligence.—The managing partner in a trading firm has authority to defend an action brought against the firm.

A solicitor employed by the managing partner in a firm to defend an action brought against the firm has authority to enter an appearance in the names of each of the partners.

Judgment was recovered in an action against a firm. The solicitor for the firm communicated this fact to the partner who had instructed him to act, but not to the other partners.

Held, that there was no evidence of negligence on the part of the solicitor.—Tomlinson v. Broadsmith, C.A., 471.

PATENT:—

1. Action for infringement—Discontinuance—Costs of particulars of objections—Patents Act, 1883, s. 29, sub-section 6—Patent Amendment Act, 1852, s. 43.—Section 29, sub-section 6, of the Patents Act, 1883, is not confined in its application to those cases only where an action is brought to trial; and the costs of particulars of objections will not be allowed unless there be a certificate by the court or a judge that the same were reasonable and proper.—Middleton v. Bradley, CH.D. STIRLING, J.

2. Infringement — Dismissal — Agreement not to appeal — Amendment of specification — Subsequent action—Vexatious proceeding—Res judicata.—An action was brought by H. against S. for infringement of a patent. During the course of the trial H. stated that he would be content with the decision of the judge on the question of disconformity between the provisional and the complete specifications. The action was dismissed on the ground that the patent was invalid for want of novelty in the invention, and also on the ground that there was disconformity between the specifications. Thereupon H. amended his complete specification to meet the objection of want of novelty, but not that of disconformity. Several years afterwards H. commenced a fresh action against S. for infringement of the patent as amended. S. then moved to dismiss the action as being frivolous and vexatious, and an abuse of the process of the court.

Kekewich, J., dismissed the action on the ground that the question of the validity of the patent was res judicata by reason of the judgment in the former action.

Held, on appeal, without deciding the point on which Kekewich, J., based his judgment, that what took place at the trial of the former action amounted to an undertaking on the part of H. that, as between himself and S., the decision of the judge on the question and disconformity should be treated as final; and that, therefore, on that ground, the action should be dismissed as a vexatious proceeding.—Horrocks v. Stubbs, C.A.

3. Infringement — Specification — Claim of "any other driving motion" — Validity — Amendment — Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), ss. 18-21.—Where a specification has been amended under the Patents Act, 1883, the amended claim is to be substituted for all purposes for the original claim, and no argument against the validity of the patent can be founded upon an alleged discrepancy between them.

An inventor took out a patent for certain improvements in machinery to be driven in a manner described, or by "any other suitable driving motion."

Held, that this alternative claim did not make the patent invalid, the particular source from which the motive power was obtained not being essential, or claimed as a part of the patent.—Marsden v. Moser, H.L.

4. Infringement—Validity—Res judicata—Estoppel —Second action between same parties—Validity denied on different grounds.—In an action by a patentee claiming damages for an infringement and an injunction, the defendant denied the infringement. He also denied the validity of the patent, alleging, amongst other things, that it had been anticipated by certain specifications.

The Court upheld the validity of the patent, but granted no injunction or damages on the ground that the evidence as to the alleged infringement was, under the circumstances, not admissible. In a second action between the same parties in respect of the same patent, the defendant again denied the validity of the patent, alleging that it had been anticipated by certain specifications which were not before the Court in the first action, and which he had discovered since that action.

Held, that the validity of the patent was res judicata, and that the judgment in the first action estopped the defendant from again denying the validity of the patent.—Shoe Manufacturing Co. v. Cutlan (No. 2), CH.D. ROMER, J.

5. Infringement action — Undertaking offered and refused—Injunction—Costs.—A plaintiff in a patent action is not entitled to an injunction as a matter of course, and if the infringement is innocent, and the defendant offers an undertaking, it should be accepted.—Jenkins v. Hope, CH.D. NORTH, J., 358.

6. Design—Infringement—Similarity in essential features—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), ss. 51, 52, 58, 60—Designs Rules, 1890, r. 9.—The plaintiffs were the registered proprietors of two designs for upright hexagonal oil-stoves. The first design consisted of a church window, with tracery above and below it. The second design was a modification of the first, and showed an extended base. The defendants sold upright hexagonal oil-stoves similar to those of the plaintiffs, though the church window was of a different style of architecture and the tracery above and below was different.

Held, that, though there were differences in detail, the plaintiffs' and defendants' stoves were alike in their essential features, and that the defendants' stove was an "obvious imitation" of the plaintiffs' within the meaning of section 58 of the Patents, &c., Act, 1883.

The insertion in an application for registration of the words "pattern, shape, configuration, and ornamentation" does not prevent the registration from being a registration of the design as a whole.

There is nothing in the Act which deprives a person who has registered a design, of his right to protection if he mistakenly puts on articles that he sells registered numbers which ought not to be there.—Harper v. Wright, C.A., 274.

7. Design — Registration — Copyright — Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), ss. 47, 60—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 50).—C. registered a design for a "Lamp for electric lighting, applicable for its shape." It was, in fact, a design for a lamp-shade, consisting of a reflecting screen which had been commonly used for gas lights, and a ventilating top not materially differing from those which had been used before for gas, except that a chimney which was required for gas lights, but not for electric lights was omitted:

Held that what C. had registered was substantially the old form of lamp-shade with the omission the chimney, which was useless when the shade was to be applied to electric lights, and that there was no such originality or novelty in the design as to make it a proper subject of registration.—Clarke's Design, Re, C.A.

By section 6 of the Pedlars Act, 1871, a pedlar's certificate shall, for the purpose of the Markets and Fairs Clauses Act, 1847, have the same effect as a hawker's license, and the term "licensed hawker" in the last-mentioned Act shall be construed to include a pedlar holding such a certificate.

Held, that a pedlar was exempted from the penalty imposed by section 13 of the Markets and Fairs Clauses Act only so long as he was trading as a pedlar as defined by section 3 of the Pedlars Act, 1871.

2. Rating—Exemption—Society for the purposes of the Fine Arts exclusively—Voluntary contributions—6 & 7 Vict. c. 36, s. 1.—A society is not "supported by voluntary contributions" within section 1 of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 36, when it returns to every contributor the equivalent in moneys worth of his contributions. "Voluntary" does not there mean "non-compulsory"; it means "gratuitous"—i.e., without any money or other merely material consideration.

3. Rating — Occupation — Beneficial occupation—London County Council—Assessment of public park—Annual value—Hypothetical tenant—London County Council (General Powers) Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. ccxliii.), ss. 4, 5.—The London County Council are not rateable for the relief of the poor in respect of land and buildings purchased and maintained by them for the use of the public as a park or recreation ground under the London County Council (General Powers) Act, 1890, the occupation of such park not being of any net annual value to them as hypothetical tenants.—London County Council v. Lambeth (Churchwardens), C.A., 621.

4. Rating—Occupation—Sessions house—Building used partly for Crown purposes and partly for county council administrative purposes—Proportionate rateability—Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 67)—Local Government Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41).—A sessions house used partly by a county council for administrative purposes, and partly for Crown purposes as the sessions house and for other judicial business, is rateable for poor and other rates and assessments under the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, so far as it is used for local administrative purposes, and so far as it is used for Crown purposes it is not so rateable.—Middlesex County Council v. St. George's Union Assessment Committee, Q.B.D., 666.

POST OFFICE:—

1. Die for making fictitious stamp—Possession—Without lawful excuse—Post Office (Protection) Act, 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. 76), s. 7 (c).—The respondent had in his possession a die for a fictitious stamp which he used for the purpose of making a representation of a postage stamp in a newspaper published in the interest of stamp collectors. The die was made abroad to the respondent's order.

Held, that the respondent had committed an offence within section 7 (c) of the Post Office (Protection) Act, 1884, which provides that a person shall not, unless he shows a lawful excuse, have in his possession a die for making a fictitious stamp.—Dickens v. Gill, Q.B.D., 686.

2. Railway—Conveyance of postal parcels—Outwards and inwards stations—Post Office (Parcels) Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 74).—In the Post Office (Parcels) Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 74), "inwards station" means the station to which a receptacle containing postal packets is directed, no matter to what station the packets themselves are ultimately to be carried; and "outwards station" means the station at which such a receptacle is delivered to the railway company, no matter whether or not it is the station at which the parcels themselves were originally delivered to the railway company to be carried by them.

Railway companies A. and B. had a joint station at C. The Postmaster-General established at C. a sorting office for parcels. Parcels intended ultimately to be carried to various stations on the A. and B. companies' railways were despatched by the Postmaster-General from London in receptacles directed to C., and there sorted, and afterwards sent back to A. or B. company to be carried to their ultimate destination. Some of these stations were nearer London than C. A. and B. companies refused to perform the labour of carrying parcels sent to C., but intended ultimately to be carried elsewhere, from the Postmaster-General's vehicles to the trains, on the ground that as regards them C. was neither an outwards nor inwards station within the Act, and that therefore they were under no duty to perform this labour. The parcels were sent to C. for the convenience of the Postmaster-General, and he should bear all expense incidental to the transfer of the parcels both from the trains to the sorting office, and back again to the trains.

Held, that the companies were bound to perform this duty, as inwards station merely meant a station to which a receptacle containing postal parcels is directed; and outwards station one where such a receptacle is delivered to the railway company for conveyance under the Act.—Reg. v. London and North-Western Railway Co., Q.B.D.

POWER:—

1. Appointment—Advancement—Implication.—A power of appointment among children was created by a will which contained the usual hotchpot and advancement clauses; but the donee of the power was empowered to direct what power of advancement the trustees should have in respect of any appointed share. The donee exercised the power of appointment by a deed which contained no advancement clause.

Held, that the appointment was to be read into the will, and that the advancement clause in the will applied to the appointed shares.—McMahon v. Gaussen, V.C. (Ir.).

2. Appointment — Execution — Irrevocable appointment to children—Subsequent appointment to wife—Subsequent appointment inoperative.—A settlement contained a power enabling the tenant for life to appoint the trust funds in favour of his children, subject to a proviso enabling him to appoint one-fourth of the income to "his wife" for her life. The tenant tor life, who was married at the date of the settlement, in exercise of this power, irrevocably appointed the trust funds to his children, subject to his own life interest and "subject and without prejudice to" an appointment of one-fourth of the income to his wife for life, "if the same should take effect." His wife having died, on his remarriage he purported to appoint one-fourth of the income to his second wife for her life. His second wife survived him.

Held, that the words "his wife" meant the wife he had at the date of the settlement. But even if this were not so, the irrevocable appointment in favour of the children, being subject only to his own life interest and the appointment in favour of his then wife and not reserving any power of appointing to a second wife, precluded him from making any further appointment.

Decision of Kekewich, J., ante, p. 426, affirmed.—Hancock, Re, Malcolm v. Burford Hancock, C.A., 545.

3. Appointment—Validity—Remoteness—Contingent remainder.—An appointment of real estate under a power in a marriage settlement, of which the appointors were tenants for life, was made to the use of A., B., and C. (children then living of a son of the appointors), and to all other the children of the said son who should happen to be living at the death of the survivor of the appointors, and to the heirs and assigns of such of them as should attain twenty-five; with a proviso that if the appointment to the after-born children of the son should fail, the deed should operate as an appointment in fee to A., B., and C., or such of them as should attain twenty-five. Subsequently to the appointment four other children were born to the son. They had not attained twenty-five at the death of the surviving tenant for life, but A., B., and C., had.

Held, to create legal contingent remainders to take effect upon the death of the survivor of the appointors; and that the seven children of the son took estates for life, with remainders in fee to A., B., and C. as tenants in common.

5. Jointuring—Jointure, Meaning of—Power to appoint portions—Benefit to appointor.—A jointure is a provision for a wife after the death of her husband, and, except under special circumstances, the court will not give effect to an appointment under a power of jointuring which is to take effect during the lifetime of the husband.

Jamieson v. Trevelyan, 10 Ex. 269, 3 W. R. Dig. 220, commented on.

The court will look closely into any exercise of a power of appointment by which the appointor benefits, but the fact of the appointor benefiting thereby does not necessarily invalidate the appointment.

PRACTICE:—

1. Appeal—Action tried without jury—Issues of fact—Rule of Court of Appeal.—Per Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes, L.J.: Where an action is tried by a judge without a jury, the presumption is that his decision on the facts was right, and that presumption must be displaced by the appellant, and unless he can satisfactorily make out that the decision of the judge was wrong, the appeal will be dismissed; and this rule applies also to the case where the witnesses have not been examined before the judge in the court below.

Per Kay, L.J.—The appeal being in the nature of a rehearing, it is the duty of the Court of Appeal, where the witnesses have not been examined before the judge in the court below, to try the case itself, and to pronounce the judgment which it thinks that the judge ought to have pronounced.—Colonial Securities Trust Co. v. Massey, C.A., 212.

2. Appeal—Divorce—Justices—Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895 (c. 39).—In an appeal to the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division from the decision of a court of summary jurisdiction under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, the practice under the Divorce Acts has no application, and it is not necessary that any case should be stated or filed. The practice in such appeals is governed by ord. lix, rr. 4A, 7, 8, 10, 11, 12, and 16.—Swoffer v. Swoffer, P.D. & AD.D.

3. Appeal—Leave to appeal after time expired—Alteration of law since judgment—Solicitor-mortgagee—Mortgagees' Legal Costs Acts, 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. c. 25), s. 3.—A solicitor-mortgagee who, before the passing of the Mortgagees' Legal Costs Act, 1895, was held not entitled to charge profit costs against his mortgagor cannot get an extension of time for appealing from such order on the ground that such Act is retrospective, for the Act was not intended to affect orders which were made before the passing of the Act.—Eyre v. Wynn-Mackenzie, C.A., 273.

4. Chambers—Appeal—Arbitration—Leave to revoke submission to arbitration—Judicature (Procedure) Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 16), s. 1, sub-section 4.—An appeal from a judge at chambers granting leave to revoke a submission to arbitration lies to the Court of Appeal and not to a Divisional Court.—Portland Urban District Council and Tilley's Arbitration, Re, Q.B.D.

5. Chambers—Appeal—"Practice and procedure"—Garnishee order—Judicature Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 16), s. 1, sub-section 4.—An appeal from an order of the judge at chambers affirming an order of the master making absolute a garnishee order is a matter of practice and procedure within section 1, sub-section 4, of the Judicature Act, 1894, and the appeal therefore lies to the Court of Appeal, and not to the Divisional Court.—Hockley v. Ansah, Q.B.D., 666.

6. Chambers—Chief clerk's certificate—Appointment to sign—Variation—Extension of time—Rules of Supreme Court, 1883, Order LV., rr. 66a, 67, 70, 71.—No attendance is necessary by any of the parties on an appointment before a chief clerk to sign the certificate, as such attendance for signature is a purely formal matter.—Lawe's Chemical Manure Co. v. Ingham, CH.D. STIRLING, J.

7. Chambers—Chief clerk's certificate—Inquiry as to personal estate—Charges of breach of trust involved—Power to deal with such charges on originating summons—Order LV., r. 3.—In an action commenced by originating summons, it was declared that the trusts of a will ought to be performed under the direction of the court, and certain inquiries were directed, among others as to the value of the mortgage securities and whether they were sufficient, and whether they should be called in or retained, and in case they were insufficient "under what circumstances and by whom the moneys owing thereon were advanced, and what valuations were taken by the persons advancing such moneys, and whether such investments were proper." Further inquiries and accounts were afterwards directed, and among others an account of the personal estate not specifically bequeathed of the testator's estate. The chief clerk certified that the investments were to a certain extent improper, and as to one of them that it was made on no sufficient valuation, and found that the defendants were liable thereon. A summons was then taken out by them asking that this might be varied, and it was so varied on the grounds that it was beyond the scope of the inquiry and not borne out by the evidence. The question now arose, the summons to vary coming on with the further consideration, what further relief there was, if any, as it lay in respect of a breach of trust, and could not presumably be given on originating summons.

Held, that the words of the inquiry above set out went too far, and that, if objection had been taken to it at the time, it would not have been proceeded with, but that not having been objected to it was now binding on the court. That that being so, it would be idle to send the applicants to commence another action, and that, as the account asked for was one upon which the defendants, if the case had occurred prior to the Judicature Acts, might have been held liable on the common account, the beneficiaries were entitled to have it taken. At the same time there was no intention of getting rid of the rule by a side wind which prevented contested cases being decided on originating summons, and if, therefore, it appeared on taking the account that it involved viva voce evidence, application should be made for directing the issue to be dealt with in the proper mode.—Stuart, Re, Smith v. Stuart, CH.D. STIRLING, J.

8. Commercial cause—Entering in commercial list—Appearance of defendant—Power to deal with costs.—After the writ in an action has been served the plaintiff may, before the defendant has entered an appearance, apply to the judge to whom commercial causes are assigned to enter the cause in the commercial list, and the judge may direct the costs of the application to be costs in the cause.

The defendant can, after entering an appearance, apply to have the order rescinded, but only on the ground that the cause is not a commercial cause.—Barry v. Peruvian Corporation, C.A., 487.

9. Commercial Court—Rules of evidence—Transfer of action commenced in Chancery Division to Queen's Bench Division—Judicature Act, 1894, s. 3.—The court established for the trial of commercial causes has no greater power than any other court to dispense with the technical rules of evidence. All its powers are derived under the Supreme Court of Judicature (Procedure) Act, 1894, and the rules made thereunder.

The circumstances under which the court will order the transfer of an action commenced in the Chancery Division to the Queen's Bench Division for trial, considered.—Baerlein v. Chartered Bank of India, C.A.

10. Costs—Security for costs—Several defendants—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 65, r. 6.—The plaintiff, who resided in America, had brought an action against four persons, three of whom were trustees of a will, and the fourth was the heir-at-law of the testator. The three trustee defendants obtained an order that the plaintiff should give security for costs for £75; the fourth defendant, who appeared by a separate solicitor, subsequently applied that the plaintiff should give security for his (the fourth defendant's) costs.

Held, that there was no evidence to show that the sum of £75 was not sufficient security for all costs; and that it should stand as security for the costs of the fourth defendant as well as of the first three defendants.—McHenry v. McHenry, C.A. (Ir.).

11. Costs—New trial motion—Shorthand notes—Summing up of judge.—Upon a motion for a new trial, an application for the costs of the shorthand writer's notes of the summing up of the judge at the trial, will only be granted in exceptional cases.—Andrews v. Mockford (No. 2), C.A.

12. Costs—Set-off—Husband and wife—Restitution of conjugal rights—Judicial separation.—A petition by a wife for restitution of conjugal rights and a counter-claim by her husband for judicial separation were both dismissed with costs by the Court of Appeal, the costs of the one to be set off against the costs of the other in the court below, and no costs of the appeal being allowed. The husband having subsequently presented an appeal to the House of Lords, the Court of Appeal ordered that the taxation of the costs should be suspended until after his appeal was determined, on his undertaking to duly prosecute it.—Russell v. Russell (No. 2), C.A.

13. Costs—Shorthand-writer's notes—Evidence at trial of action before a judge and jury—Summing up of the judge.—In an ordinary case, in the absence of special directions, the practice is not to allow the costs of the shorthand-writer's notes of the evidence taken at the trial of an action before a judge and jury, but only of the judge's summing up.—Pilling v. Joint Stock Institute, C.A.

14. Costs—Taxation—Witnesses expenses—Photographs—Notice to admit—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 65, r. 27 (9) (20) (29) (37) (38).—The costs of witnesses subpœnaed but not actually called, are within the taxing-master's discretion; and the taxing-master must exercise his discretion without reference to scales and rules before the Judicature Act, 1873,

15. Discontinuance by trustee in bankruptcy of plaintiff—Fresh action by assignee of trustee—R. S. C., ord. 25, r. 4.—A plaintiff having become bankrupt, his trustee in bankruptcy elected not to continue the action, and thereupon an unconditional order was obtained by the defendants staying further proceedings. B. having purchased the trustee's interest, commenced a second action for the same relief as that asked by the former action. Kekewich, J., dismissed the second action, as an abuse of the process of the court and as frivolous and vexatious. The trustee, who alone had the right of action in him, having by his election barred anybody subsequently becoming entitled through him to the same cause of action. On appeal:

Held, that the action ought not to be dismissed in a summary way as frivolous and vexatious, as the question was one that required consideration—namely, whether the order staying the proceedings in the former action was equivalent to a judgment for the defendants.—Bean v. Fowler, C.A.

16. Discovery of documents—Demise—Forfeiture—Action to recover possesseon of demised premises.—The defendant in an action to recover possession of demised premises on a forfeiture for breach of covenant may be ordered to make an affidavit of documents, but he may refuse to disclose any documents which would establish the case of forfeiture against him.—Seaward v. Dennington, C.A., 696.

17. Discovery — Documents from co-defendants—Order 31, r. 12.—A railway company brought an action against contractors, the contractors putting in a counter-claim with their defence, to which they made an insurance corporation defendants, and in which they alleged that the company had obtained a guarantee from the corporation which was enforceable against them, and that the company were trustees of this guarantee for the contractors, and payment of the amount thereof was claimed. The corporation put in a defence that the guarantee had been released and satisfied, and the company in reply repudiated any collusion between them and the corporation. In the event of the contractors being successful in obtaining a declaration that the company were trustees of this guarantee and endeavouring to enforce the guarantee, the defence of the corporation would be that the company had released their liability, but this would not preclude the case, because the contractors would reply that that release was not binding as against them. The corporation having taken out a summons for discovery under Order 31, r. 12, against the company, their co-defendants:

Held, in these circumstances that there was "some right between these parties to be adjusted in the action," namely, whether or not the liability of the corporation under the guarantee was good, and that the case fell therefore within the rule.

19. Discovery—Interrogaties—Libel in newspaper Circulation of newspaper.—In an action for libel against the proprietors of a newspaper the plaintiff delivered an interrogatory asking the number of copies printed and circulated of the issue of the newspaper containing the alleged libel. The defendants answered that a considerable number of copies were printed and published.

Held, that the answer was sufficient.

20. Discovery—Penal or criminal matter—Pollution of Rivers Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 75), s. 10. —By the Pollution of Rivers Act, 1876, s. 10, the county court has power, where any offence against the Act is committed within its district, by summary order, to require any person to abstain from the commission of such offence, and, where the offence consists in default to perform a duty under the Act, to require him to perform such duty in the manner in said order specified. The county court has, under the same section, the further power, in case of default being made in complying with any such order, of ordering the payment of a penalty.

Held (affirming the decision of the Divisional Court, ante, p. 543), that proceedings instituted to obtain the former order were not proceedings in a penal or criminal matter, and that the county court judge had jurisdiction to make an order for discovery in them.—Derbyshire County Council v. Derby (Mayor of), C.A.

21. Discovery — Privileged communications—Production—Fraud—Inspection by judge—R. S. C., ord. 31, r. 19a, sub-rule 2.—Communications between a solicitor and his client as to the subject-matter of an alleged fraud are not privileged from production in an action where fraud is charged.—Williams v. Quebrada Railway Co., CH.D. KEKEWICH, J., 76.

22. Dismissing action for want of prosecution—Notice of trial—Trial not entered—Discretion as to form of order—Ord. 36, rr. 12, 16, 20.—When the plaintiff has given notice of trial but has not entered the trial, and the defendant applies to dismiss the action for want of prosecution, the court or a judge has a discretion, under ord. 36, r. 12, either to dismiss the action or to order that it be dismissed unless notice of trial be given, and the trial entered within a certain time, or to make such other order as may seem just.—Sievier v. Spearman, C.A.

22a. Evidence—Privilege—Statements made by one party to the solicitor of another party.—Two persons were engaged in a joint adventure, in the course of which one of them had interviews with the solicitor of the other at that other's request.

Held, that statements made to the solicitor at such interviews were privileged.—Rochefoucauld v. Boustead, CH.D. KEKEWICH, J.

23. Execution—Order for payment of costs—Solicitor — Attachment — Disciplinary jurisdiction of the court—Order in a criminal matter—Election in favour of one of two remedies—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 42, r. 24. —A person is not precluded from bringing an action to enforce an order of the court for the payment of costs, under ord. 42, r. 24, by reason only that he has a remedy by attachment under the order.

Where there is a remedy by action and also a remedy by attachment in respect of the same matter, the plaintiff is not precluded from exercising the one remedy by having made an unsuccessful attempt to enforce the other.

But, semble, per Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes, L.J., that if the plaintiff had obtained a writ of attachment, and the defendant had been taken under it, the plaintiff's remedy by action would have gone.

An order for the payment of the costs of proceedings taken to have the name of a solicitor struck off the rolls is not an order in a criminal matter.—Godfrey v. George, C.A., 245.

24. Indorsement of claim—Title of action—Plaintiff suing on behalf of himself and others—R. S. C., ord. 3, r. 4.—The fact that a plaintiff is suing in a representative capacity on behalf of himself and others ought to appear in the title of the action, and not buried in the statement of claim.

25. Injunction—Notice of action—Evasion of writ —Light.—On May 23 A. wrote to B. complaining of a building B. was erecting as interfering with ancient lights. On May 24 A. commenced an action. B. evaded service till May 28, and in the meantime hurried on the building and carried it up to its full height.

Held, that A. was entitled to a mandatory injunction as to that part of the building erected between May 24 and 28.—Von Joel v. Hornsey, C.A.

25a. Injunction—Notice of motion—Service out of the jurisdiction—Foreign subjects—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 11, r. 1 (f), ord. 52, r. 9.—Leave to serve notice of motion for an interlocutory injunction, with notice of the writ in an action, out of the jurisdiction, upon some of the defendants who are foreign subjects, will be given, without prejudice to any question which may arise on the order.—Overton v. Burn, C.A.

26. Injunction—Suspension of injunction by Court of Appeal—Further suspension—Court to which application should be made.—In an action commenced in the Chancery Division an injunction which was asked for was refused, and an inquiry as to damages was ordered. On appeal the Court of Appeal varied such order and granted an injunction, but suspended its operation for six months.

An application to further suspend the operation of the injunction was made to the court of first instance.

Held, that such application had been properly made to the court of first instance.—Shelfer v. City of London Electric Lighting Co., C.A., 198.

27. Joinder—Causes of action—Waiver—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 18, r. 2.—Appearance to a writ does not waive objection to a joinder with an action for recovery of land, of causes of action other than those specified in ord. 18 r. 2.

28. Judgment by consent—Order passed and entered by the registrar—Consent given under mistake—Motion to vary judgment—Power of court to alter judgment—R. S. C., ord. 28, r. 11—Fresh action to set aside judgment.—A court can only, except possibly with the consent of all parties to the action, interfere with a judgment passed and entered (not being an order made on an interlocutory application) (1) in the case of an accidental slip which can be rectified under R. S. C., ord. 28, r. 11; (2) where the court finds that the judgment as drawn up does not state what it decided and intended.

The proper remedy for a party who has consented to a judgment under a mistake is to proceed by a fresh action to set aside such judgment.—Ainsworth v. Wilding, CH.D. ROMER, J., 540.

29. Mayor's Court—Appeal—Notice of appeal—Condition precedent—Extension of time—Mayor's Court of London Procedure Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. clvii), s. 8—R. S. C., 1883, ord, 59, r. 16.—It is a condition precedent to the right of appeal under section 8 of the Mayor's Court of London Procedure Act, 1857, that the appellant should give notice of appeal within two days. This provision is not affected by the general power conferred on the High Court by ord. 59, r. 16, to extend the time for bringing an appeal from an inferior court.—Kirby v. North British and Mercantile Insurance Co., C.A., 529.

30 Particulars, Application by defendants for—Discovery, Application by plaintiffs for—Fraud—Discretion of court to order discovery before particulars.—There is no general rule that delivery of particulars by the plaintiff should precede the making of discovery by the defendant in all cases except those where there is a fiduciary relation between the parties.

The judge must in every case exercise his discretion, having regard to all the circumstances.

31. Particulars—Slander of title—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 19, r. 7.—A statement of claim alleged that the defendant had slandered the plaintiff's title to certain lands by publishing certain words "just before the exposure to sale by auction of said lands," "whereby the persons desirous of buying were prevented from bidding" to the plaintiff's loss.

Held, that the plaintiff should give the defendant particulars of the occasions when and where such words were spoken, and also of the persons present on such occasions; and the best particulars that could be given of the persons desirous of buying and who were prevented by reason of the words complained of.—Roche v. Meyler, Q.B.D. (Ir.).

32. Parties—Bankruptcy of defendant—Receiving order—Official receiver wrongfully added as a party to the action—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 17, r. 4—Bankruptcy Acts, 1883 and 1890.—The mere making of a receiving order does not cause any change or transmission of interest or liability.

Consequently, where a receiving order had been made against the defendant in an action, and an ex parte order adding the official receiver as a defendant thereto obtained by the plaintiff under R. S. C., 1883, ord. 17, r. 4, the latter order, upon the application of the official receiver, was discharged.—Berry, Re, Duffield v. Williams, CH.D. STIRLING, J., 346.

33. Parties—Death of plaintiff—Survival of cause of action—Action of mandamus—Statutory duty—Right of executors to continue action—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 17, rr. 1, 4.—An action was brought by the owner of a mill against a local authority for a mandamus commanding the defendants to make proper sewers in accordance with section 15 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and to give facilities for carrying the plaintiff's liquid refuse into the sewers under their control in accordance with section 7 of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876. The plaintiff having died while the action was pending, Held, that the cause of action survived, and that the executors of the plaintiff were entitled to an order allowing them to continue the action.—Peebles v. Oswaldtwistle Urban District Council, C.A., 513.

34. Parties—Joinder—Action under Lord Campbell's Act (8 & 9 Vict. c. 93)—Maritime collision.—In a suit under Lord Campbell's Act numerous plaintiffs sought to recover separate damages as due to each plaintiff or group of plaintiffs for injuries resulting from a maritime collision said to have been caused by the negligence of the defendants.

Held, that there was no express or implied authority in the Rules of Court to warrant the joinder in one suit of different and distinct causes of action not being causes of action by and against the same parties.

Smurthwaite v. Hannay, [1894] A. C. 494, followed.—Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Co. v. Tsune Kijima, P.C.

35. Parties — Joinder of defendants — Distinct causes of action—Ord. 16, r. 4.—Separate tortfeasors cannot, since the Judicature Acts, be joined as co-defendants in an action for damages.

Semble, that the action would not be maintainable if the claim was limited to an injunction.

Judgment of the Court of Appeal, ante, p. 50, affirmed.—Sadler v. Great Western Railway Co., H.L.

36. Patent action—Jurisdiction of Court of Appeal to allow amendment of particulars of objections—46 & 47 Vict. c. 57, s. 29—R. S. C., ord. 58, r. 4.—The Court of Appeal has, under ord. 58, r. 4, jurisdiction to allow the amendments of particulars of objections; but

Held, that, on the merits, leave to amend ought not to be given, as the defendant would not be prejudiced by the judgment in the action if he afterwards sought to have the plaintiff's patents revoked.—Shoe Manufacturing Co. v. Cutlan, C.A., 92.

37. Payment into court—Order for payment into court on motion—Admission by defendant of receipt of money—Improper payments by defendant.—Upon an interlocutory motion, money will not be ordered to be paid into court by a constructive trustee unless it is actually in his hands. It is not sufficient that it has been in his hands and that he is responsible for it.

Neville v. Matthewman, 42 W. R. 675, [1894] 3 Ch. 345, and Nutter v. Holland, 43 W. R. 18, [1894] 3 Ch. 408, followed.—Crompton v. Burton, CH.D. NORTH, J., 60.

38. Payment into court—Trust money—Admission of misapplication by trustee—Motion by some plaintiffs only—Discretion of court as to order—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 32, r. 6.—An application under R. S. C., 1883, ord. 32, r. 6, for an order on admissions of fact by a defendant in an action cannot be made on behalf of some only of the plaintiffs.

There is a judicial discretion as to the making of an order upon a trustee to pay into court trust money which he admits having received and wrongfully applied.—Wright, Re, Kirke v. North, CH.D. KEKEWICH, J., 125.

39. Pleading—Counter-claim—Defendant to counter-claim not party to original action—Right to counter-claim against plaintiff—Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 24, sub-section 3—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 19, r. 3; ord. 21, rr. 11, 14.—A defendant to a counter-claim, not being a party to the original action, but brought in by the original defendant on his counter-claim, is not entitled to counter-claim against the original defendant and plaintiff.

40. Pleading — Document — Contents — Effect — Sufficiency—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 19, r. 21.—The statement of claim in an action for the recovery of land contained the following paragraph: "By the will of the said H. L., made on the 27th of February, 1785, and duly proved on the 18th of July of that year, the said M. L. become entitled to the said estates in fee in reversion on the determination of certain estates tail limited in the said will."

Held, that the paragraph was properly pleaded under ord. 19, r. 21, and that it was not necessary to set out the precise words of the will.—Darbyshire v. Leigh, C.A., 452.

41. Pleading—Statute of Frauds—When it must be pleaded—R. S. C., ord. 19, r. 15.—The plaintiffs, by a writ specially indorsed, claimed "£152, being the amount payable under a guarantee signed by the defendant, and dated the 11th of June, 1895, in respect of goods sold and delivered to, and work and labour done for, the Lux Publishing Co., between April, 1894, and the 13th of June, 1895. The defendant did not plead the Statute of Frauds, but he set out, in his defence, the guarantee, which was not sufficient to satisfy the statute.

Held, that the defendants could not rely upon the Statute of Frauds because he had not raised that defence by his pleading, and was not relieved from the necessity of pleading that defence by the statement in the statement of claim that the guarantee was in writing.—Odhams v. Brunning, C.A.

42. Set-off—Costs—Solicitor's lien—Independent proceedings—Action in county court—Application to Chancery Division—R. S. C., ord. 65, rr. 14, 27, reg. 21.—Costs incurred in the High Court cannot be set off against costs incurred in a county court in the same matter.

Construction of ord. 65, r. 14, adopted by the Divisional Court in Edwards v. Hope, 33 W. R. 672, 14 Q. B. D. 922, approved and applied.

A motion in the High Court to set off the costs of an application to the High Court, which had been dismissed with costs without any direction to stay execution, against costs to which the applicants became subsequently entitled by an order of a county court in the same matter, was dismissed with costs by the court in the exercise of its discretion. The applicants thereupon asked to be allowed to set off the costs of their unsuccessful motion against the costs due to them under the order of the county court.

Held, on the principle of Edwards v. Hope, that there was no jurisdiction to allow a set-off in such a case.—Hassell v. Stanley, CH.D. CHITTY, J., 405.

43. Special case—Proceedings extra Cursum Curiæ —Appeal—Jurisdiction—Ord. 34, r. 1.—Where a special case is calculated and intended to raise for decision questions of fact only, the proceedings are extra cursum curiæ, the judgment of the court is in the nature of an arbitrator's award, and an appeal cannot be entertained if its competency is objected to by the party holding the judgment. If in these circumstances the Court of Appeal reverses the judgment below, the House of Lords has no jurisdiction except to reverse as incompetent the judgment of the Court of Appeal.—Burgess v. Morton, H.L.

44. Time — Enlargement — Redemption action — Order to pay into court—Default—Mistake—Payment in after time specified—Jurisdiction—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 64, r. 7.—In a redemption action an order was made giving leave to the plaintiff to lodge a sum of money in court to cover the amount due to the mortgagee, and directing that in default of payment being made within two months of the date of the order that "the action be dismissed, with costs."

Owing to a bonâ fide mistake on the part of the plaintiff's solicitor, the money was not paid in until after two months from the date of the order, though within two months of the date of the order being entered and passed. No application had been made to dismiss the action.

Held, that the action was still alive, and that the court had jurisdiction to extend the time for payment in.—Collinson v. Jeffery, CH.D. KEKEWICH, J., 311.

45. Trial — Assessors — Scientific investigation — Ord. 36, r. 5.—By ord. 36, r. 5, a judge may direct the trial without a jury of any cause, matter, or issue requiring any scientific investigation which in his opinion cannot conveniently be made with a jury.

The plaintiff's ship was sunk in the defendants' docks while being moved by their tugs from one berth to another. As she was without cargo or ballast, compensation booms were attached to her to keep her upright while being moved. The operation of moving her was carried out in such a way that the tugs pulled the ship over, and she sank. The judge at chambers held that there was an issue in the action requiring scientific investigation, and he ordered the action to be tried before a judge with two assessors.

Held, by Lord Esher, M.R., and Rigby, L.J. (Lopes, L.J., dissenting), that there was in the action an issue requiring scientific investigation, and that therefore the judge at chambers had jurisdiction to make the order. — Swyny v. North-Eastern Railway Co., C.A.

46. Trial—Motion for new trial—Enlargement of time—Imposition of terms—Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict, c. 44), s. 1—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 64, r. 7.—A motion for a new trial or to set aside the verdict of a jury is, since the passing of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1890, to be made to the Court of Appeal, and not to a divisional court. Consequently, on the hearing of any such motion, the Court of Appeal has power, by virtue of ord. 64, r. 7, to enlarge the time within which to move for a new trial, and to impose such terms as the justice of the case may require.—Wilkins v. Wilkins, C.A., 305.

47. Trial — New trial — Libel — Misdirection — "Substantial wrong or miscarriage"—R. S. C., ord. 39, r. 6.—In an action for libel the judge misdirected the jury in favour of the plaintiff upon a material part of the libel and the jury gave a verdict for large damages. The Court of Appeal thought that the nature of the libel was such that the jury would have been entitled to give, and would probably have given, the same verdict, even if the direction had been the other way, and refused the defendant's application for a new trial on the ground that in their opinion no "substantial wrong or miscarriage" had been occasioned by the misdirection, within the meaning of ord. 39, r. 6.

Held, reversing the decision of the Court of Appeal, that since the assessment of damages is the peculiar province of the jury in an action for libel, and since the jury had not had the defendant's real case submitted to them and might, in assessing the damages, have been influenced by the misdirection, there had been a substantial wrong or miscarriage within ord. 39, r. 6, and that there must be a new trial.—Bray v. Ford, H.L.

48. Trial— Non-suit — Insurance—Fire policy — Compliance with condition in policy.—Where in an action on a fire policy the plaintiff's evidence showed that they could have complied much more fully and completely than they had done, with a condition in the policy as to giving within fifteen days a detailed account of their loss "as the nature and circumstances of the case will admit."

Held, that they were rightly non-suited; for even if the question of compliance were for the jury, a verdict could not have been reasonably given in plaintiff's favour. — Hiddle v. New Zealand National Fire Insurance Co. P.C.

49. Writ—Defendant's address—Mistake in writ—Ord. 2, r. 3.—The defendant resided and carried on business in Ireland. He was served in England with a writ of summons in which he was described as "of L., in the county of Lancaster."

Held, that the mistake as to the defendant's address did not invalidate the writ.—Smith v. Hammond, Q.B.D., 478.

50. Writ—Domiciled Scotchman carrying on business in England under firm name—Service on manager in England—Motion to set aside—Ord. 48*a*, r. 11.—B., a domiciled Scotchman, residing in Glasgow, carried on business there and also in Liverpool under the firm name of G. & J. B., but the business belonged to B. alone. The plaintiffs, who had formerly carried on another business in partnership with B., issued a writ in the Palatine Court against G. & J. B., and served it upon the manager of the Liverpool office of G. & J. B. The writ was claimed relief in respect of the partnership formerly subsisting between the plaintiffs and B.

Held, that such service was not authorized by ord. 48*a*, r. 11, and must be set aside.—MacIver v. Burns, C.A., 40.

51. Writ—Service out of the jurisdiction—Action for infringement of patent—Injunction—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 11, r. 1 (f).—Foreign manufacturers supplied goods to an English firm of retail dealers. The plaintiffs, alleging that such goods were an infringement of their patent, commenced an action against the English dealers, and applied ex parte to North, J., in chambers for leave to issue a concurrent writ and serve notice of it on the foreign manufacturers out of the jurisdiction.

Held (reversing the decision of North, J.), that the plaintiffs had made out a primâ facie case within R. S. C., 1883, ord. 11, r. 1 (f); and the leave asked for was granted.—Badische Anilin Fabrik v. Johnson, C.A., 308.

52. Writ—Service out of the jurisdiction—Defendant domiciled in Scotland—Agreement to give court jurisdiction to order service—Ord. 11, r. 1 (e).—Where the defendant is domiciled or ordinarily resident in Scotland or Ireland, the parties cannot by agreement give the court power to allow the writ to be served out of the jurisdiction under ord. 11, r. 1 (e).—British Wagon Co. v. Gray, C.A., 113.

53. Writ—Specially indorsed writ—Action for recovery of land—Landlord and tenant—Mortgagor attorning tenant to mortgagee—Tenancy at will—Ord. 3, r. 6 (f); ord. 14, r. 1.—By a mortgage deed the mortgagor attorned tenant to the mortgagee from year to year, there being a clause in the deed that the mortgagee might at any time, without giving any previous notice of his intention to do so, enter upon and take possession of the premises and determine the tenancy created by the attornment. The mortgagee having brought an action to recover possession of the premises,

Held, that the tenancy created by the attornment clause was a tenancy at will which the mortgagee could determine at any time; that the claim to possession was not based on a forfeiture; and that the writ could be specially indorsed under ord. 3, r. 6 (f), and judgment for possession signed under ord. 14, r. 1.

PRINCIPAL and AGENT:—

1. Company—Debentures—Trustees for debenture-holders—Receiver—Liability for goods ordered by receiver.—By a deed made between a limited company and the defendants as trustees for debenture-holders, by which the business and property of the company were mortgaged to secure payment of the debentures, it was provided that in certain events the trustees might by writing under their hands appoint a receiver of the mortgaged premises, who should have power to carry on the business, and that any receiver so appointed should be the agent of the company, who alone should be liable for his acts and defaults. The defendants were two of the members of a banking firm, who were the holders of the debentures. They appointed a receiver under the deed, stipulating that all moneys received by him as receiver should on the day of their receipt be paid in to an account to be opened by him with the banking firm, and that cheques drawn by him upon the account should be countersigned by their solicitor. Shortly after the appointment of the receiver an order was made for the compulsory winding up of the company. Subsequently to the winding-up order, the receiver continued to carry on the business, and in the course of so doing ordered goods from the plaintiffs. In an action against the defendants for the price of the goods,

Held, by Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes, L.J., Rigby, L.J., dissenting, that the correct inference was that, at any rate after the winding-up order, the defendants were the principals for whom the receiver, as agent, carried on the business, and consequently the action was maintainable against them.—Gaskell v. Gosling, C.A.

2. Contract — Company — Underwriting contract irrevocable to take shares not executed by agent—Subsequent acceptance by agent and withdrawal by principal—Authority coupled with interest—Irrevocability—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 35.—A. executed an underwriting contract in form irrevocable to take shares in a company. The contract was not executed by the agent intrusted to subscribe on A.'s behalf in the form provided, but was accepted by him in terms by separate letter. Subsequently A. wrote the secretary withdrawing from the contract, but the company, on the initiative of the agent, proceeded to allotment. The agent received some substantial benefit from the contract.

On a motion by A. to have his name removed from the register of members on the ground that the allotment to him was made without his consent.

Held, that the underwriting contract was an authority coupled with an interest, and was therefore irrevocable.

Gaussen v. Morton (10 B. & C. 731) applied.—Hannan's Empress Gold Mining Co., Re, CH.D. STIRLING, J.

PRINCIPAL and SURETY:—

Co-sureties—Contribution—Alteration in bond—Materiality—Discharge of sureties.—A bond was given by the defendant C. as principal, and by the defendants N., E., P., and B., as sureties, by which they were jointly and severally bound to the plaintiffs in the sum of £150. The condition of the bond was that if C. duly accounted to the plaintiffs for all moneys received by him for them, the bond should be void. The bond provided that the liability of N. and E. should be limited to £50 each, and of P. and B. to £25 each. N. was the last surety to sign the bond, and after his signature added, in good faith, the words "for £25 only." The principal made default in the sum of £48.

Held, in an action against the principal and sureties, that the alteration by N. was a material alteration, casting an additional burthen upon the other sureties, and that as against them the bond was thereby rendered void; that the bond was also rendered void as against N., for his liability under the bond was undertaken on the faith of the joint liability of the other sureties.—Ellesmere Brewery Co. v. Cooper, Q.B.D., 254, 257.

PROBATE:—

1. Administration—Bodily incapacity of executor—Grant during incompetency for use and benefit.—Where a sole executor was bodily incapable of acting, and likely to remain so for some time, the court granted letters of administration with the will annexed to a residuary legatee for life, for the executor's use and benefit during his incompetency.—Ponsonby, In goods of, P.D. & AD.D., 240.

2. Administration—Bond—Foreign sureties.—An application to allow an administration bond to be given with foreign securities should be made to a judge in chambers.—Scott, In goods of, P.D. & AD.D.

3. Administration—Grant de bonis non—Amount of security.—On the application for a grant de bonis non the court allowed the grant to go, upon the usual bond being given in double the amount of the unadministered estate.—Oakey, In goods of, P.D. & AD.D., 432.

4. Administratian—Intestacy—Married woman—Husband a bankrupt—Small estate—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 121—Grant to Senior Official Receiver in Bankruptcy—Husband passed over—Citation dispensed with—Administrator's personal bond only—Sureties dispensed with.—In the case of the estate of a married woman who had died intestate, leaving her husband, who survived her, an undischarged bankrupt, whose estate was vested in the hands of the Chief Official Receiver in Bankruptcy, under the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 121:

The Court, upon motion by the Chief Official Receiver, made a grant to him of the personal estate and effects of the deceased intestate, and on account of the smallness of the estate, dispensed with any citation upon the husband of the deceased, and, as the administrator applied in his official capacity, accepted the administrator's personal bond without sureties.

5. Administration — Intestate's estate of value under £500—Grant to executor of widow who had not taken administration—Intestates' Estates Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 29), s. 1—Probate Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 77), s. 73.—A widow died without taking administration to her husband's estate, which was of the net value of under £500, and, as he died without issue, belonged exclusively to her, under section 1 of the Intestates' Estates Act, 1890. The court granted administration to her executor, under section 73 of the Probate Act, 1857.—Bryant, In Goods of, P.D. & AD.D.

6. Administration—Residuary legacy for benefit of convent—Death of legatee and executor—Grant to head of convent—Charity—No scheme required.—Where a residuary legacy was given by a will to C. H. "to be disposed of as she shall think fit at her discretion for the benefit of" a certain convent, and the only executor of the will and C. H. both died during the testatrix's lifetime, the court granted letters of administration with the will annexed to the Reverend Mother the head of the convent, on being satisfied of the permanence of the institution, and the fitness of the Reverend Mother, having regard to her powers, to receive and apply the legacy in question, the court being satisfied that it was not necessary to require a scheme to be propounded, on the authority of Walsh v. Gladstone, 1 Ph. 290.—McAuliffe, In Goods of, P.D. & AD.D., 304.

7. Administration—Small estate—Creditor's application—Citation of next of kin dispensed with—Court of Probate Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 77), s. 73.—On the application of a creditor for administration of a small estate, the court made the grant, under section 73 of the Court of Probate Act, 1857, on notice of motion to the next of kin, without requiring them to be cited.—Teece, In Goods of, P.D. & AD.D., 400.

8. Administration— Will—Foreign and English independent wills—Probate of English will only.—If a testator makes two independent wills, one disposing of property in England, and the other of property abroad, the former alone is entitled to probate in England.

A testator, a domiciled Englishman, made a will relating exclusively to his property in America, in which he directed the executors thereof to realize his property there, and remit the proceeds to his London bankers, to be placed to the account and credit of the executors of any will he might make dealing with his English property, or of his administrators if appointed in England. Subsequently he made a will in England with totally different executors to those of the American will, and by it he directed the executors of that (the English will) to stand possessed of the moneys remitted from America in the manner before mentioned on the same trusts as those declared by the will of the residue of his English property, with power to direct the American executors when they should realize.

The court held that these were independent wills, and refused to admit the American will to probate.—Murray, In Goods of, P.D. & AD.D., 414.

9. Administration with will annexed—Sole executrix and residuary legatee a lunatic not so found by inquisition—Citation of other next of kin—Probate Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 77), s. 73—Limited grant to nominee of guardians.—The sole executrix and residuary legatee of a testatrix, who was also one of her next of kin, did not prove the will, and, some time after the death of the testatrix, became and remained chargeable to the rates as a pauper lunatic not so found by inquisition.

The court required that the other next of kin should be cited, and, upon this being done, and no appearance being entered on their behalf, made, under section 73, a grant of letters of administration with the will annexed in favour of the nominee of the guardians of the union, for the use and benefit of the lunatic executrix, limited to the duration of her lunacy.—Hockin, In Goods of, P.D. & AD.D.

10. Administration with will annexed—Will in execution of power of appointment—Foreign domicile of testatrix.—A testatrix having at time of her death a French domicile, executed in pursuance of a power of appointment a will in English form, but invalid according to French law.

Administration with the will annexed was granted in England, the court considering itself bound by In Goods of Alexander, 29 L. J. P. & M. 93.—Huber, In Goods of, P.D. & AD.D.

11. Amendment of grant—Error in name of executor.—A grant of probate was made to an executor in the name F. M., he being so described in the will, but his real name was F. J. M. The Bank of England refused to register the will or transfer stock belonging to the estate owing to this discrepancy.

The court allowed the grant to be amended by making it to "F. J. M., known in the will as F. M."—Honywood, In Goods of, P.D. & AD.D., 256.

12. Will—Attestation—Witnesses dead—Difficulty in proving handwriting—Secondary evidence—Presumption Omnia rite esse acta—Position of signatures—Lord St. Leonards' Act (15 Vict. c. 24), s. 1.—The testator executed a holograph will in 1874 and died in 1886. There was no attestation clause to the will, and one of the witnesses predeceased the testator; the other died in 1887. The signature of one attesting witness appeared above that of the testator himself. The handwriting of the testator and of one witness to the will was proved by oral evidence and by comparison of samples of handwriting; but the only sample of writing of the other witness, apart from his signature on the will, was a signature in the register of his own marriage in the year 1822. Evidence was given to show that every possible effort had been made to prove the handwriting of this witness, and evidence was also given to show that the person who purported to have signed the will as a witness was the same who was married in 1822, and who purported to have signed the marriage register in that year. Evidence was also given to show that the two witnesses and the testator had lived together in the same institution at the date of the will, and that the testator had stated that the document in question was his will, and that the two persons, whose names appeared upon it, had witnessed it.

Held, that the will was entitled to probate, as there was sufficient to support the presumption of law Omnia rite esse acta, and the position of the signatures was covered by Lord St. Leonards' Act.—Byles v. Cox, P.D. & AD.D.

13. Practice—Evidence—Presumption of death—Filing letter of Life Insurance Co.—Where the only proof of death of the testator was by presumption from his disappearance, coupled with the fact that notice of the motion for probate of testator's will had been given to the insurance company in which testator had insured his life, and that a letter had been received from the company stating they did not intend to interfere in the proceedings:

Held, that probate could be granted subject to the letter being filed.—Saul, In Goods of, P.D. & AD.D.

14. Practice—Evidence—Presumption of death—Necessity for advertisements.—On an application for leave to swear an affidavit of the death of a person who had disappeared, the court, though the estate was small, and the person had not been heard of for twenty-five years, ordered that advertisements requesting information concerning him should be published in newspapers.—Robertson, In Goods of, P.D. & AD.D.

15. Practice—Necessity for lodging documents in registry.—The court refused to hear a motion for the revocation of a grant of probate, and a declaration of the validity of a draft will, where the probate and draft had not been lodged in the registry. Riley, In Goods of, P.D. & AD.D.

16. Will—Attestation—Words following signature—Incorporation by reference.—Testator by his will devised and gave all his property to "my trustees and executors hereinafter named, upon trust."

The will was signed and attested, but below the signature and attestation clause was written these words: "I find on reading the above previous to the execution thereof that I omitted to name my trustees and executors. I hereby appoint my son and my friend X. my executors and trustees."

It was proved that these words were written by testator before the execution of the will:

Held, that the added words could not be included in the probate.—White, In Goods of, P.D. & AD.D. (Ir.).

17. Will—British subject domiciled in Kentucky—Property in England—Decree of foreign court—Administration, with last will annexed, revoked—Probate of earlier will.—A British subject, domiciled in Kentucky, died leaving several wills, the last of which was proved in one of the inferior courts of that State, and thereupon administration, with the will annexed, was granted to the attorney in England of the widow, who was the sole executrix. Subsequently, the superior courts of Kentucky upset the will, and the widow commenced a suit for revocation of the said letters of administration, and for probate of an earlier will. Upon affirmative proof of the testamentary capacity of the deceased:

The Court revoked the letters of administration, and granted probate of the earlier will, now propounded by the plaintiff.—Newcomb v. Newcomb, P.D. & AD.D.

18. Will — Executor — Chain of executorship — Executor of executor—Disappearance of executor to whom power to prove reserved—Citation by advertisement.—Probate of a will was granted to one of two executors, power being reserved to make the like grant to the other executor. The acting executor died, not having fully administered; at the date of his death the other executor had not been heard of for fourteen years. The daughter and sole next of kin of the testator, with the assent of the executors of the acting executor, moved for a grant to herself of letters of administration de bonis non.

Held, that the grant could not be made, as, upon the non-appearance to a citation of the executor to whom power to prove had been reserved, the chain of executorship would be continued in the executors of the acting executor without any fresh grant from the court. Leave given to effect service of the citation on the absent executor by advertisement.

In the Goods of Noddings (2 Sw. & Tr. 15, as amended by the corrigenda in that volume) followed.—Reid, In Goods of, P.D. & AD.D.

19. Will—Foreign will—Some assets in England—German law—Executor according to the tenor—Probate of copy.—The will of a domiciled German was proved by his widow in Germany and deposited with a committee of the parish council, and by the law of Germany could not be removed from their custody. By the will the widow had the same duties and rights as an executor here.

Held, that probate might be granted of a notarial copy of the original will properly proved to the widow, as executrix according to the tenor, limited to such time as might elapse before the original will should be brought in.—Linden (Baron Von), In Goods of, P.D. & AD.D., 448.

20. Will — Lunatic's will — Executors — Costs.—Executors propounding the will of a lunatic which showed signs of insanity on the face of it, were held liable for costs, although they had evidence showing they were unaware of the condition of the deceased.—Rogers v. Le Cocq, P.D. & AD.D.

21. Will—Married woman—Lapsed bequest—Administration to husband refused.—Where a married woman made a duly executed will and appointed an executor:—

Held that although by reason of a lapse no property passed by the will, yet that the executor named should prove; and consequently that an application by the husband for a grant of administration should be refused.—Dodsworth, In Goods of, P.D. & AD.D.

Charity—Religious and Charitable Institutions Act, 1861, s. 3—Incorporated body.—Where a bequest was made to the "Presbyterian Church at Spring Hill, Brisbane, called St. Paul's, and its congregation," and it appeared that the congregation had voluntarily joined the Presbyterian Church of Queensland, which body had been incorporated under the Religious and Charitable Institutions Act, 1861:

Held, that the congregation, having regard to the terms of incorporation, had become constituent members of the Church, so that the bequest in their favour was a bequest to the incorporated body, and was invalid by reason of its not having been registered or attested in the mode prescribed by the Act.—McSwaine v. Lascelles, P.C.

RAILWAY:—

1. Arbitration—Umpire's fees paid by landowner—Action to recover—Taxation—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), ss. 34, 35.—A landowner who himself takes up the award of the umpire in an arbitration and pays the umpire's fees cannot recover them from the railway company, though such fees may be costs which, under the statute, are payable by the promoters of the undertaking.

Where such fees have been paid by the landowner and the amount has been disallowed on taxation by the taxing-master, the decision of the taxing-master cannot be reviewed in an action against the railway company.—Shrewsbury (Earl) v. Wirrall Railways Committee, C.A., 19.

2. Customer—Special Act—Competing railways—Excessive rates.—By a special Act, promoted by one railway company and opposed by another, running powers were given to the promoters over the line of their opponents, but these were to remain in abeyance so long as they should afford all reasonable facilities for goods and mineral traffic . . . . "at rates per mile not greater than the lowest rate" charged by the opponents for like traffic to or from three distinct places.

Held (Lord Halsbury, L.C., Lords Watson, Ashbourne, Macnaghten; Lord Morris dissenting), that the Act was for the advantage of the public; that the railway company were under a legal obligation to the appellants as customers who could insist on its provisions; and that the appellants, therefore, were entitled to ascertain the mileage rate to each of the three different places, and to take the lowest of the three as the basis of the rate to be charged.

By Lord Watson.—The provisions of a Railway Act, even when they impose mutual obligations, differ from private stipulations in this essential respect, that they derive their existence and their force, not from the agreement of parties, but from the will of the Legislature. And when provisions of that kind are not limited to the interests of the parties mutually obliged, but impose upon one or other or both of them an obligation in favour of third parties, who are sufficiently designated, I am of opinion that the obligation so imposed must operate as a direct enactment of the Legislature in favour of these parties, and cannot be regarded as a mere stipulation inter alios in which they may have an interest, but have no title to enforce.

Decision of the Court of Appeal, 42 W. R. 215, [1894] 1 Q. B. 43, reversed.—Davis v. Taff Vale Railway Co., H.L., 172.

3. Footway—Highway—Railway carried across public footpath—Duty to build bridge—Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20), s. 46.—Where a railway crosses a public footway there is no obligation imposed upon the railway company by section 46 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, to build a bridge so as to carry the railway over the footway, or the footway over the railway. Such an obligation, if any, can only be imposed by the company's special Act.—Reg. v. Bexley Heath Railway Co., C.A., 501.

4. Leaseholds—Compulsory purchase—Payment out of purchase money—Charges and expenses incident thereto—Letters of Administration—Lands Clauses Act, 1845 (8 Vict. c. 18) s. 80.—A railway company purchased under their compulsory powers leaseholds which were bequeathed by the will of A. in trust for B. for life, remainder to C. absolutely, and the purchase money was paid into court. C. having died intestate, and an order having been made for payment out of the money,

Held, that the costs of taking out administration to C. must be borne by the company.

Ex parte Kelly, 31 L. R. Ir. 137; 41 W. R. Dig. 113, followed.

Held, also, that the company were not liable to pay the costs of taking out administration de bonis non to the estate of A.—Lloyd and North London Railway Co., Re, CH.D. STIRLING, J., 522.

5. Negligence—Level crossing—Contributory negligence—Onus of proof with regard to contributory negligence.—A railway line crossed a public footpath on the level, the approaches to the crossing being guarded by hand gates. A watchman who was employed by the railway company to take charge of the gates and crossing during the day was withdrawn at night.

The dead body of a man was found on the line near the level crossing at night, the man having been killed by a train which carried the usual head light, but did not whistle or otherwise give warning of its approach. No evidence was given of the circumstances under which the deceased got on to the line.

An action on the ground of negligence having been brought by the administratrix of the deceased, the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff.

Held (12 App. Cas. 41), affirming the decision of the Court of Appeal, that even assuming (but without deciding) that there was evidence of negligence on the part of the company, yet there was no evidence to connect such negligence with the accident: that there was therefore no case to go to the jury, and that the railway company were not liable.

Observations as to the onus of proof with regard to contributory negligence.—Wakelin v. London and South-Western Railway Co., C.A.

6. Passenger's luggage—Negligence—Ticket taken by servant—Luggage belonging to master—Right of master to sue.—The plaintiff's servant took a ticket as a passenger by the defendants' railway, and handed his portmanteau as his personal luggage to one of the defendants' servants, who, in carrying it to the train, negligently dropped it on to the line, and it was run over by a train, and the portmanteau and its contents were destroyed. The portmanteau contained a suit of livery, which was the property of the plaintiff, and which the plaintiff had provided for the servant to wear while in her service. In an action by the plaintiff to recover damages for the loss of the livery, Held, that, though there was no contract between the plaintiff and the defendants, the defendants were liable to the plaintiff for the misfeasance of their servants, which caused the loss.—Meux v. Great Eastern Railway Co., C.A.

7. Severed land—Communication by level crossing—Severance of ownership—Easement—Abandonment—Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20), s. 68.—A railway company in 1855 constructed their line through the lands of R., and made a level crossing between the severed parts. In 1885 R. sold the land on the one side to P., and reserved no right to cross the line himself, and gave P. no right to cross. In 1888 R. sold the land on the other side of the line to T., the predecessor in title of G. The railway company removed the gates and erected fences on their own land where the gates had been. G. claimed the right to use the level crossing, and removed the fences.

Held, that the conveyance of 1885 was a final abandonment by R. of his right to use the level crossing. The obligation on the railway company by virtue of section 68 of the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, to maintain the accommodation work at all times, ceased when the ownership of the adjoining lands was severed, and was a duty which the company owed to the private individual as owner, and not a public duty.—Midland Railway Co. v. Gribble, C.A., 133.

8. Statutory Powers—Expiration of period for completion of works—Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20), s. 16.—Section 16 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, empowers a railway company, subject to the provisions of the special Act, to execute various works and "from time to time" to alter, repair, or discontinue the before-mentioned works and substitute others in their stead.

Held, that the powers of this last clause were not subject to a restriction in the special Act as to the time for the completion of the railway.—Emsley v. North Eastern Railway Co., C.A.

9. Traffic—Carriage of merchandise—Disintegrating rate—Total charge below maximum for conveyance alone—Duty of company to disintegrate—Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 25), s. 33, sub-section 3.—The provisions of section 33, sub-section 3, of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888, which require a railway company to render an account dividing the charge claimed for the carriage of merchandise, and distinguishing the charge for conveyance from the terminal charges (if any), are not confined to cases where the total charge claimed exceeds the amount which is authorized for conveyance alone, but apply equally where the total charge is under the maximum for conveyance alone; but where the whole charge claimed is below the maximum for conveyance, it is a sufficient compliance with the terms of the sub-section if the company state in a formal document, and take the responsibility of such statement, that the whole charge is for conveyance alone, and that no part of it is for terminal or other services.

Form of order in such cases set out.—New Union Mill Co. v. Great Western Railway Co., Q.B.D.

10. Traffic—Increase of rates—Standard of reasonableness—Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 54), s. 1, sub-section 1.—By the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1894, s. 1, sub-section 1, "Where a railway company have, . . . since the last day of December, 1892, directly or indirectly increased . . . any rate or charge, then if any complaint is made that the rate or charge is unreasonable, it shall lie on the company to prove that the increase of the rate or charge is reasonable, and for that purpose it shall not be sufficient to show that the rate or charge is within any limit fixed by an Act of Parliament or by any Provisional Order confirmed by Act of Parliament."

In a case where rates for the carriage of coal had been indirectly increased on the 1st of January, 1893,

Held, by Collins, J., that the effect of the Act was not necessarily in all cases to declare the increased rates void, but that all future increases of rates must be tried by the standard of reasonableness, depending on circumstances existing or apprehended before the increase was made, and therefore, in the case then before the court, before the Act came into operation.—Derbyshire Silkstone Coal Co. v. Midland Railway Co., Rickett & Co. v. Same, Grassmoor Co. v. Same, Q.B.D.

11. Traffic—Increase of rates by several railway companies—Joinder of all—Practice—Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1894 (c. 54), s. 1.—Where a complaint is made under section 1 of the Railway Traffic Act, 1894, that an increased rate made by a railway company jointly with other railway companies is unreasonable, all such railway companies shall be made respondents.—Mapperley Colliery Co. v. Midland Railway Co., Q.B.D.

12. Traffic—Railway Commissioners—Jurisdiction Cartage charges—Increase of rate—Complaint of unreasonableness—Railway Rates Confirmation Acts, 1891, 1892—Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1894 57 & 58 Vict. c. 54). s. 1, sub-section 1.—Where a railway company have, since the last day of December, 1892, increased a rate or charge for cartage, and complaint is made that the rate or charge is unreasonably, exclusive jurisdiction is not vested in an arbitrator appointed by the Board of Trade under the Railway Rates Confirmation Acts, 1891, 1892, but the Railway Commissioners have jurisdiction to hear and determine the complaint.—Mansion House Association of Railway Traffic v. London and North-Western Railway Co., Q.B.D.

RESTRAINT OF TRADE:—

Covenant—Validity—Reasonableness—Partial enforcement.—The defendant, on entering the service of the plaintiff, a milkman, agreed that he would not during the continuance of such service, or at any time thereafter, serve, solicit, or interfere with, for his own benefit or for the benefit of any person other than the plaintiff, "any of the customers which shall at any time be served by or then belonging to the employer" in his business; the plaintiff's business was then carried on exclusively in the locality of St. George's-in-the-East.

Held, that the agreement referred only to the business as then carried on by the plaintiff in that locality, and would not apply to a new business started by the plaintiff in any other locality, and that the restraint was reasonable as to space; that the covenant was severable, and an injunction could be granted restraining the defendant from serving persons who were customers of the plaintiff during the time when the defendant was in plaintiff's service.—Dubowski v. Goldstein, C.A., 436.

1. Foreshore—Thames—Right to dredge and raise sand—Thames Conservancy Act, 1894 (c. 187), s. 87.—Grantees from the Crown of the foreshore of the tidal portion of the Thames are entitled to dredge and raise sand and gravel on their own property without obtaining a licence from the Thames Conservators.

The expression "bed and soil" in section 87 of the Thames Conservancy Act, 1894, does not include foreshore.—Pearce v. Bunting; Reg. v. Wedd, Q.B.D.

2. Riparian owner—River bed—Accretion.—The owner of a several fishery in a public navigable river is, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, presumed to be the owner of the bed of the river. The mutual rights of the owner of the bed of a river by virtue of a several fishery, and the riparian proprietors are not affected by accretions to the bed or by the lowering of the water, so long as the accretions or the soil from which the river has receded still remain part of the river bed.

SALE OF GOODS:—

1. Agreement for hire and purchase—Mercantile agent—Goods passed to mortgagees as part of the appurtenances of ship—Possession of goods with consent of owner—Factors Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 45), ss. 2, 9—Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), ss. 5, 9, 35.—Under a hire and purchase agreement A. supplied a trawl warp to B., the master of a fishing smack which was at that time mortgaged, together with its equipments. By the terms of the agreement, the hirer B. was to pay £4 a month until the full sum of £15 5s. was made up, when the warp should become the property of B., but until then it should remain the absolute property of A.; the agreement contained stipulations enabling A. to put an end to the agreement and retake possession of the warp in certain events; but no stipulation enabling B. to terminate the agreement by delivering up the warp to A. Subsequently, before all the instalments on the warp were paid, the mortgagees took possession of the smack, and claimed the warp as forming part of the appurtenances of the ship, which passed to them under the terms of their mortgage.

Held, that the mortgagees' claim was valid, as B. had "agreed to buy" the warp within the meaning of section 9 of the Factors Act, 1889, and the addition of the warp to the equipment of the mortgaged ship was a sufficient delivery or transfer to the mortgagees by a mercantile agent under a "disposition," within the meaning of the provisions of that section.

2. Hire and purchase agreement—Agreement to buy—Disposition by hirer—Factors Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 45), s. 9.—W. had obtained possession of goods from the plaintiffs under an agreement by which W. agreed to hire the goods, value £23, "and to pay the sum of 12s. 6d. per month for the hire thereof, commencing with the date of this agreement, and payable in advance on the seventh day of each succeeding month until the full sum of £23 be paid, at which time, and on the completion of such payments, the said company agree to give up all claim to the said goods." There was a stipulation that, upon default in payment, W. would give up possession of, and that the plaintiffs might seize the goods; and there was also a declaration that the goods should remain the property of the plaintiffs until the sum of £23 was paid, and that they were only lent on hire.

Held, that W. was in possession of the goods under an agreement to buy within the meaning of section 9 of the Factors Act, 1889, and that a transfer by way of pledge by him to the defendant, who received the goods in good faith and without notice of the claim of the plaintiffs, was valid.—Thompson v. Veale, C.A.

3. Hire and purchase agreement—Possession of goods by hirer—Fraudulent sale by hirer before property has passed—Conviction of hirer for larceny as a bailee—Revesting of title in owner by such conviction—Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 71), s. 24.—Decision of Queen's Bench Division in Payne v. Wilson (43 W. R. 250) reversed on appeal, in consequence of the decision of the House of Lords in Helby v. Matthews, 43 W. R. 561.—Payne v. Wilson, C.A.

4. Warranty—Implied condition of fitness—Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (c. 71), s. 14.—By the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, s. 14, where goods are supplied under a contract of sale, and "the buyer, expressly or by implication, makes known to the seller the particular purpose for which the goods are required, so as to show that the buyer relies on the seller's skill and judgment, and the goods are of a description which it is in the course of the seller's business to supply (whether he be the manufacturer or not), there is an implied condition that the goods shall be reasonably fit for such purpose; provided that in the case of a contract for the sale of a specified article under its patent or other trade name there is no implied condition as to its fitness for any particular purpose."

Coals were supplied under a written contract of sale containing no mention of the particular purpose for which they were required, though prior to the making of such contract the buyers made known that purpose to the sellers, who were coal agents, and relied on their skill and judgment. In an action for damages for breach of warrant by the sellers:

Held, that evidence of what took place between the parties prior to the making of the contract was admissible to raise the implication of the condition specified in section 14, and therefore by virtue of that section a warranty or condition by the sellers that the coals were reasonably fit for the purpose for which they were required must be implied:

Held, also, that a contract for the sale of coals under a particular description known in the coal trade was not "a contract for the sale of a specified article under its patent or other trade name" within the meaning of the proviso to section 14.—Gillespie & Co. v. Cheney & Co., Q.B.D.

SCOTLAND, LAW of:—

1. Portion—Satisfaction—Double portions.—The English rule against double portions to children does not obtain in Scotland. In an ante-nuptial marriage settlement made on the marriage of his adopted daughter the testator covenanted to pay £4,000 with interest at the rate of 4 per cent. from his death, to be held on trusts declared by reference to the trusts of the adopted daughter's property; with the exception that on the failure of children of the marriage, the £4,000 should be held on trust for the testator absolutely. By the marriage contract the adopted daughter assigned to her trustee all after-acquired property. Subsequently the testator, by his trust disposition and settlement, or will, among other "legacies and annuities" directed his trustees to pay "a legacy of £4,000" to his said adopted daughter "who shall be allowed interest at 5 per cent. on that sum so long as she shall prefer to allow it to remain as part of the share in the indigo concern."

Held, affirming the Court of Session, Scotland (22 Ct. Sess. Cas. 4th Series (Rettie), 396), that by Scottish law, coupled with the words of gift used, the £4,000 given by the will was not intended by the testator to be in satisfaction of the £4,000 covenanted to be paid in the marriage settlement, but a legacy in addition thereto.—Johnstone v. Haviland, H.L.

2. Superior and vassal—Obligation in feu charter to rebuild—Disposition of feu after obligation has become enforceable—Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 94), s. 4, sub-section 2.—A proprietor by feu-contract disponed certain subjects to a company "and its successors and assignees whomsoever," under the condition, inter alia, "That the company and its foresaids" should be bound to erect buildings suitable for a hydropathic establishment of not less value than £15,000, and to uphold buildings of that value in all time coming, and to keep the same insured against fire to the extent of not less than that sum, and in case the said buildings should be destroyed by fire to rebuild the same so as to maintain the total value of £15,000. Buildings were erected of the stipulated value, and insured. The company sold the subjects to the first-named appellants. On November 7th, 1893, the buildings were destroyed by fire, and on the 27th of the same month the superior, the respondent, raised an action against the first appellants for performance of the obligation to rebuild. Before defences were lodged the first appellants, by a duly recorded disposition, conveyed the subjects to the second appellants, who subsequently conveyed them to one John Wilson. All these were thereafter made parties to the action.

The first appellants then pleaded that, as they were no longer vassals in the feu, they were not liable in the performance of the obligation.

The First Division of the Court of Session decided that the obligation, having become prestable during the first appellant's tenure, continued to be binding upon them; and (2) that all the defenders were jointly and severally liable to rebuild in respect that the obligation was a condition of the grant remaining unfulfilled during the respective periods of their tenure of the subjects (22 Rettie, 954).

Upon appeal to the House of Lords the appellants, after argument, consented that the appeal should be dismissed.—Callander Hydropathic Co. v. Marshall, H.L.

SETTLED LAND:—

1. Act of Parliament—Settlement—Tenant for life—Thellusson Act (39 & 40 Geo. 3, c. 98), s. 1—Will—Next of kin—Executor of deceased next of kin—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), s. 2, sub-sections 1, 5; s. 58, sub-section (1) V.—The survivor of two next of kin and the executors of the deceased next of kin were, under the joint operation of a will and the Thellusson Act, entitled during the life of another to receive the rents of the property subject to the trusts of the will in equal moieties.

Held, that, inasmuch as the definition of a settlement in section 2, sub-section (1), of the Settled Land Act, 1882, included a will and an Act of Parliament, the will and the Thellusson Act together created a settlement within the meaning of the Act.

Held, also, that the survivor of the next of kin and the executors of the deceased next of kin together either constituted the tenant for life for purposes of the Act, by virtue of section 2, sub-section (5), of the Act, or had the powers of a tenant for life under the Act by virtue of section 58, sub-section (1) V., of the Act.—Vine v. Raleigh, CH.D. CHITTY, J., 169.

2. Improvements—Costs of where no prior scheme—Payment by tenant for life—Application for repayment out of capital moneys—45 & 46 Vict. c. 38, s. 26—53 & 54 Vict. c. 69, s. 15.—A tenant for life having actually paid the cost of improvements in respect whereof no scheme under section 26 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, had ever been submitted, applied to the court under section 15 of the Settled Land Act, 1890, to be recouped out of capital moneys in the hands of the trustees.

Held, that the court has jurisdiction to allow such recouping; but that, the works having been executed and paid for, the application must be considered with greater strictness than if the work was still to be done.—Tucker's Settled Estate, Re, C.A.

3. Married woman—Person having the powers of a tenant for life—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), ss. 2 (1), 58 (1) (ix.).—Under a will land was limited to the use of trustees during the life of a married woman upon trust to pay the income to her for her separate use without power of anticipation, with remainder to such uses as she should by will appoint, and in default of such appointment to the use of herself in fee.

Held, that by virtue of section 58 (1) (ix.) of the Settled Land Act, 1882, the married woman was entitled to exercise the power of sale conferred by that Act upon tenants for life.—Pocock's Contract, Re, CH.D. STIRLING, J., 247.

4. Settlement—Capital money—Investment—Tenant for life, Direction by—Trustees—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), ss. 21, 22 (2), 53.—The tenant for life under a settlement has power conferred on him by the Settled Land Act, 1882, of directing the mode of investment of capital money arising under the Act, and selecting the particular investment, subject only to the limitations expressed in the Act itself, and cannot be controlled by the trustees or the court in the exercise of this statutory power so long as he really and honestly exercises his discretion.—Coleridge's (Lord) Settlement, Re, CH.D. CHITTY, J., 59.

5. Settlement—Limited power to purchase land—Money "liable to be laid out in the purchase of land"—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), s. 33.—Under the trusts of a settlement by which the moiety of certain freehold lands and also certain personalty were settled, the trustees were authorized, at the request of the tenant for life, to invest the personalty in the purchase of the unsettled moiety of the freehold lands.

Held, that money in the hands of the trustees forming part of the personalty might be applied by the trustees under section 33 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, as capital moneys in the purchase, jointly with the owner of the other moiety, of adjoining convenient freeholds.—Hill Re, Hill v. Pilcher, CH.D. KEKEWICH, J., 573.

SETTLEMENT:—

1. Mortgage by trustees for a term—Repayment by arrangement in eighteen months with additional sum representing interest for a further year—Tenant for life and remainderman.—A fund settled by will on a person for life, with remainder to others in fee, was invested by the trustees on mortgage with a covenant that it should remain on the security for ten years. Afterwards an agreement was made under which it was repaid with interest in about eighteen months from the date of the agreement, with an additional sum representing in amount interest for a further year at the old rate.

Held, that the additional sum was capital, not income, and belonged wholly to those entitled in remainder to the fund.—Searancke Re, Simonds v. Huntington, CH.D. NORTH, J.

2. Voluntary assignment—Death of beneficiary—"Failure of gift"—Residuary trust—Resulting trust—T., who was contingently entitled to a prospective share in certain property, voluntarily assigned it, in 1880, to trustees upon trust (among other trusts) to pay a sum of £500 to one K., and as to the residue upon other trusts. T. became entitled to her share in the property in 1894, and, by a letter, in 1895, directed that a portion of it should be transferred to the trustees of the voluntary assignment of 1880. K. died in 1888, intestate, and the question now arose as to his £500, which was claimed (1) by his personal representative, (2) by those entitled to residue, and (3) by the settlor as upon a resulting trust.

Held, (1) that, following Re Corbishley's Trusts (18 Ch. D. 846), a person dead at the date of the execution of a deed could take no benefit under it, and the confirmation of the deed by the letter in 1895 only set up such trusts as were then subsisting, and had no retrospective effect; (2) that, following Page v. Leapingwell (18 Ves. 463), the failure of the gift to K. did not make it fall into residue, and that the donees of the residue could only take an aliquot portion; and (3) that the £500 belonged to T., the settlor, by way of resulting trust.—Tilt Re, Lampet v. Kennedy, CH.D. CHITTY, J.

SHERIFF:—

1. Execution — Writ of fi. fa.—Breaking open outer door—Shop.—It is lawful for a sheriff in executing a writ of fi. fa. to break open the outer door of a shop which is not connected with a dwelling-house.—Hodder v. Williams, C.A., 98.

2. Practice—Seizure under fi. fa.—Claim—Claim admitted by execution creditor—Interpleader summons—Application by sheriff for protection—R. S. C., ord. 57, rr. 1, 15, 16, 17.—The sheriff, having seized goods under a fi. fa. which were claimed by a third person, gave notice of the claim to the execution creditor, who five days afterwards gave him notice to admit the claim and to withdraw from possession. The sheriff did not withdraw, but took out an interpleader summons, upon the hearing of which the judge made no order, and refused to order that no action should be brought against the sheriff.

Held (dismissing the appeal), that the judge had properly refused to make an order protecting the sheriff from any action.—Sodeau v. Shorey, C.A.

SHIP:—

1. Bill of lading—Cargo of frozen meat—Refrigerating machinery—Implied warranty of fitness at time of shipment.—In a bill of lading stated to be for the carriage of a cargo of frozen meat there is an implied warranty that the ship is, at the time of shipment, fit to carry such a cargo. Exceptions in the bill of lading freeing the shipowner from liability for damage from a failure of machinery do not apply to the condition of the machinery at the commencement of the voyage, but only to contingencies which may occur during the progress of the voyage.—Maori King (Owners of) v. Hughes, C.A., 2.

2. Bill of lading—Carriage of goods—Short delivery—Burden of proof.—A shipowner is bound to deliver the full amount of goods signed for by the master in a bill of lading, unless he can prove that the whole or some part of it was in fact not shipped.

In an action for freight for the conveyance of 1,000 bales of jute against the appellants, onerous indorsees of the bills of lading, the appellants claimed to retain the value of twelve bales short delivered of the 1,000 shown by the bills of lading signed by the master to have been shipped at the port of loading. There was no clear evidence as to how or where the missing bales had disappeared.

Held (reversing the Court of Session), that there was nothing to displace the evidence supplied by the bills of lading that the missing bales had been received on board the vessel, and that the appellants were entitled to the deduction claimed by them.—Smith v. Bedouin Navigation Co., H.L.

3. Bill of lading—Damage to cargo—Bill of lading incorporating the Harter Act (Act of Congress, February 13, 1893)—Negligence in "management" of the vessel in port of discharge.—Goods were shipped under a bill of lading incorporating the Act of Congress known as "the Harter Act," by which the owner of the vessel is not to be "held responsible for damage or loss resulting from faults or errors in navigation or in the management of" the vessel.

After the arrival of the vessel at her port of destination, and during the discharge of the cargo, it became necessary to stiffen the ship. For this purpose the engineer ran water into a ballast tank, but negligently omitted first to ascertain the condition of the sounding-pipe and casing, which had, owing to heavy weather during the voyage, become broken. The owner of the goods damaged by the water getting to the cargo sought to render the shipowner liable.

Held, that the shipowner was exempt from liability, as the damage resulted from a fault in the "management" of the vessel, and the operation of the exception as to "management" was not limited to the period during which the vessel was at sea, but extended to the period during which the cargo was being discharged. — Glenochil, The, P.D & AD.D.

4. Bill of lading—Liability of owner—Exception—Condition—Due diligence to make ship seaworthy—Want of diligence on part of servant.—A bill of lading contained a clause exempting the shipowner from liability for loss resulting from faults in navigation, provided due diligence was exercised by him to make the ship seaworthy. The ship's carpenter, who was admitted to be a competent workman, omitted to close one of the portholes before the ship started, in consequence of which the ship was rendered unseaworthy.

Held, that the shipowner had not satisfied the proviso on which his exemption from liability depended.—Dobell v. Rossmore Steamship Co., C.A., 37.

5. Charter-party—Bill of lading—Charter-party making the master the agent of the charterers for certain purposes—Liability of owner of chartered ship on bills of lading signed by master—Constructive notice.—A charter-party expressly stipulated that the captain and crew, although paid by the owners of the ship, should be "the agents and servants of the charterers for all purposes," and that in signing bills of lading the captain should "only do so as agent for the charterers," who thereby agreed to indemnify the owners from all consequences or liabilities that might arise from the captain signing bills of lading. Goods were shipped under a bill of lading which made no specific mention of this stipulation, but provided for delivery at the port of discharge, under certain conditions, "and all other conditions as per charter."

Held (1), that such a stipulation, though valid as between the charterers and the owners, did not protect the owners from a claim by the holders for value of the bill of lading, founded on the negligence of the master in delivering the goods to the wrong persons; and (2) that the words "all other conditions as per charter" did not incorporate into the bill of lading the above-mentioned stipulation in the charter-party so as to make it binding by way of constructive notice upon a holder for value of the bill of lading who had no actual notice of such stipulation.

Observations on the undesirability of extending the equitable doctrines of constructive notice to commercial transactions. — Manchester Trust v. Furness, C.A., 178.

6. Charter-party—Cargo—Liberty to call at other ports—Deviation—Damage.—The defendant agreed to carry for the plaintiff in the defendant's ship "a cargo or estimated quantity of 470 quarters of wheat" from R. to G. The charter-party was headed "Dead weight capacity 125 tons," and contained the usual clause excepting sea perils, and a clause giving the ship liberty to call at any ports. The 470 quarters of wheat weighed 102 tons. The defendant shipped other goods besides the wheat for delivery at P. After discharging these goods at P., and while proceeding to G., the plaintiff's wheat was injured.

Held, that the plaintiff had not hired the full carrying capacity of the ship, and that the defendant was at liberty to call at other ports for the purpose of loading and discharging other cargo; that in going to P. he had not deviated from the chartered voyage, and was therefore not liable for the injury to the wheat.—Caffin v. Aldridge, C.A., 129.

7. Charter-party—Demurrage—Colliery guarantee—Incorporation.—By the charter-party it was agreed that the ship should receive "a full and complete cargo" to be loaded as customary at G., as per colliery guarantee, in fifteen colliery working days.

Held (Kay, L.J., dissenting), that the provisions of the colliery guarantee as to loading were incorporated into the charter-party.—Monsen v. Macfarlane, C.A.

8. Charter-party—Demurrage—Damages in nature of—Lay days—Scottish Judicature Act, 1825 (6 Geo. 4, c. 120), s. 40.—A charter-party provided that the steamship River Ettrick should proceed to Bo'ness to receive a cargo of coal, demurrage to be paid at a specified rate, "lay days to count from the time the master has got the ship reported berthed." On the 17th of October the shipowner wrote to the the charterers "River Ettrick has left for Bo'ness," and asked them to supply cargo for the 19th. The vessel arrived in the roads of Bo'ness on that date, but in consequence of the crowded state of the dock she was not allowed to enter. On the 21st a loading berth became vacant in consequence of cargoes not being ready for vessels which had arrived before The River Ettrick. If the cargo had been ready for The River Ettrick she would have got this berth. No cargo being ready for her she was not allowed to enter the dock. A few days afterwards she got her cargo. The shipowner claimed damages for the delay caused by the alleged fault of the charterers in not having the cargo ready on the 21st, on the ground that there was an obligation on the charterers to have the cargo ready. On appeal a preliminary point was raised by the charterers that, inasmuch as this was a case originating in the Sheriff Court, the facts found in the interlocutor appealed from were final; and a fact given only in Lord Traynor's judgment could not be founded on.

Held, affirming the Court of Session, Scotland (22 Sess. Cas., 4th Series (Rettie), 796), that the claim of the shipowners was altogether unreasonable, even if the case could be gone into.—Little v. Stephenson, H.L.

9. Charter-party—Demurrage—Discharge of cargo—Joint operation—Duty of Shipowner—Duty of consignee—Cargo of timber spars—Custom of timber trade.—The operation of discharging the cargo of a ship is a joint operation, in which it is the duty of both the shipowner and the consignee to take part. This applies as well to a cargo of timber as to other kinds of cargo. Where a charter-party provides that the ship shall discharge a cargo of timber spars overside into lighters, the shipowner is not bound to do more than place the spars over the side of the ship in such a position that they may be within reach of the lighter; it is then the duty of the consignee to receive the spars and place them in the lighter.—Petersen v. Freebody, C.A., 5.

10. Charter-party—Port charges—Light dues.—In a charter-party providing for the payment of port charges, the expression port charges mean all charges which a vessel has to pay before she gets her clearance from a port, and therefore to include whatever light dues she may be required to pay at such port.—Newman v. Lamport, Q.B.D.

11. Charter-party—"Safe port"—Ship unable to reach port without being lightened—Evidence of custom of port.—A ship was chartered to proceed with a cargo of grain to a port of call "for orders to discharge at a safe port. . . . Discharge to be given with dispatch, according to the customs of the port of discharge, and to be all at one port. . . . Charterers to have the privilege of naming the discharging dock . . . the dock to be one into which the vessel can at once safely enter and lie afloat at all times." She was ordered to discharge at Gloucester. The basin at Gloucester is approached by a canal seventeen miles long. On arrival of the ship at Sharpness, which is at the entrance to the canal, she was found to be of too great a draught to proceed up the canal. The charterers requested the master to discharge a sufficient part of the cargo at Sharpness to allow of her navigating the canal, and to proceed to Gloucester with the remainder. The master refused to do so, and discharged the whole at Sharpness. Gloucester and Sharpness are for commercial purposes different ports. In an action by the charterers for breach of the charter-party:

Held, that the port of Gloucester, being one which the vessel could not safely reach with a full cargo, was not a safe port within the meaning of the charter-party; and that evidence of a custom of the port for vessels carrying grain to be lightened at Sharpness to allow of their proceeding up the canal to Gloucester was inadmissible, as being inconsistent with the terms of the charter-party by which the discharge was to be "at a safe port."

Neilsen v. Wait (16 Q. B. D. 67) distinguished.—Reynolds v. Tomlinson, Q.B.D.

12. Cargo—Deck cargo—Horses and cattle on deck—Liability to light dues—Mode of measurement—The Merchant Shipping Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 80), s. 23.—Horses and cattle carried as deck cargo on the deck of a vessel are "goods" within the meaning of section 23 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1876, and such horses and cattle, and the cattle pens in which they were carried, are liable to be measured in, under that section, as part of the ship's tonnage in respect of which light dues are payable.

In measuring "the tonnage of the space occupied by such goods at the time at which such dues become payable," only the sheds or the parts of the sheds actually occupied by the horses or cattle at the time when the dues become payable, that is at the time of the arrival of the vessel, are to be measured, and outside measurements of the sheds are not to be taken. The measurements are to be confined to the spaces actually occupied by the animals, making a fair and reasonable allowance for the free bodily motions of the animals, and making a proper difference in the case of pens in which smaller animals, such as sheep or pigs, are carried. — Richmond Hill Steamship Co. v. Trinity House, C.A.

13. Collision—Bye-laws of the Port or Harbour of Newport, 1894, arts. 12 and 13—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 16.—Where there is a local rule regulating the sides on which vessels shall enter and leave a harbour such rule does not supersede the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea when, according to the state of the tide, there is no defined entrance separating the harbour from the open sea.

A steamer entered the harbour of Newport to the westward of the Bell-buoy across the western flats, instead of entering to the eastward of the Bell-buoy, and collided with an outcoming steamer which had the incoming steamer on her own starboard hand.

Held, that it was the duty of the outcoming steamer under article 16 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, to keep out of the way of the incoming steamer, and that the incoming steamer was not to blame, as she was justified under the circumstances in proceeding on across the bows of the outcoming steamer, so as to go up on the right side of the channel as laid down in Rule 12 of the Bye-laws of the Port or Harbour of Newport, 1894.

The Harvest (11 P. Div. 90) distinguished.—Winstanley, The, P.D. & AD.D.

14. Collision — Damage — Wreck — Expenses of raising—Basis of calculation—Remoteness of damage—The Mersey Docks Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. xxx.), s. 11.—The Mersey Docks and Harbour Board are by statute (37 & 38 Vict. c. xxx.), the conservancy authority of the port of Liverpool, and may (by section 11) raise any wreck, sell it, and out of the proceeds retain the expenses.

A lightship and a dredger, the property of the Board, were sunk by the negligence of those in charge of the defendants' vessels, and the Board, having raised the wrecks, sued the defendants for the damages sustained.

Held, that in respect of raising the wrecks, the Board were entitled to recover from the defendants such an amount as represented the cost of the apparatus necessarily used on the particular occasion and provided by the Board for such purposes; such cost comprising interest upon the capital invested in the apparatus, repairs, a depreciation fund, and the insurance of the apparatus against risk.

The Harrington, 13 P. D. 48, approved.

The Board claimed £1,500 damages for the loss of the use of the dredger during the fifteen weeks she was under repair, alleging that she might have been let at the rate of £100 a week after completing the work upon which she was engaged at time of the collision.

Held, that the damages were too remote to be recovered.—Emerald, The: The Greta Holme, C.A.

15. Collision—Steamships—Narrowing of lights—Indications of risk—Regulations for preventing Collisions at sea, article 18.—Where two steamships are approaching one another at sea in such a position as to pass in safety, the closing in and coming more into line of the masthead and a side light is not necessarily such an indication that the ship is altering her course so as to cause risk of collision and to impose upon the other ship the duty to obey article 18 of the regulations.—Albis, The, P.D. & AD.D.

16. Collision—Tug and tow — Fog — Stopping—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, 1884, art. 18.—By article 18 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, "Every steamship, when approaching another ship, so as to involve risk of collision, shall slacken her speed, or stop and reverse, if necessary."

A four-masted barque, in tow of a tug, in a dense fog at night in the St. George's Channel, was going at the rate of 1½ knots an hour, and did not stop, though she heard the whistle of a steamer on her port side gradually nearing and indicating danger. The steamer was proceeding at about 2½ knots an hour, and heard the whistle of the tug crossing her bows from starboard to port. She ported and reversed her engines on seeing the barque, but struck her at right angles on her port quarter, and was held to blame under article 18 for not stopping sooner.

Held, that the barque was not also to blame for not stopping, as a tug encumbered with a tow is not to be deemed a steamship for all purposes under the rules, and the speed was slow as was possible consistently with keeping the tow-rope sufficiently taut to prevent the risk of the two vessels being drawn together, and the propeller of the tug being fouled.—Lord Bangor, The, P.D. & AD.D.

17. Freight—Damage to goods—Loss of merchantable character — Insurance — Profit on chartered freight—Warranted free from all average—Concealment of material fact.—The plaintiffs, who were merchants, chartered a ship, the freight being a lump sum of £3,900, upon the terms that all freight earned by the ship should be for the plaintiffs. They insured with the defendants, who were underwriters, "profit on charter for £2,000 . . . warranted free from all average." The ship took a cargo on board, in respect of which the bills of lading freights amounted to £4,690. While the ship was proceeding to the port of discharge she was run into by another vessel and sunk. The cargo was subsequently got up, and it was found that one part, consisting of dates, was so damaged as to be unmerchantable as dates. In consequence, no freight was earned on the dates, and the bills of lading freights actually received by the plaintiffs came to less than the chartered freight.

Held, that the subject matter of the insurance was the anticipated profit on the charter; that there had been a total loss of the profit; and that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover from the defendants the difference between £3,900, the chartered freight, and £4,690, the total amount of the bills of lading freights.

At the time the insurance was effected the defendants were not told whether the chartered freight was a lump freight or a tonnage freight.

Held, that there had been no concealment of material facts by the plaintiffs, for the defendants knew that there was a charter-party in the usual form, and the plaintiffs were not bound to give information as to the freight unless the defendants asked for it.—Asfar v. Blundell, C.A., 130.

18. General average — Prior particular average damage—Constructive total loss—Amount of general average contribution—Deduction of one-third new for old.—A ship, after receiving a particular average damage, incurred a general average loss, and on arrival in port was condemned as a constructive total loss, and sold.

Held, that, in order to ascertain the amount to be contributed to by ship and cargo in general average, the value of the ship must be taken just before the general average sacrifice was made; that such value was to be arrived at by deducting the estimated cost of repairing the particular average damage from the value of the ship before that damage; and that from the value so ascertained the amount realized by the sale of the ship must be deducted, the balance being the amount to be contributed to in general average.

Held also, that, in estimating the cost of repairing the particular average damage in such a case, a deduction of one-third new for old could not be made.—Henderson v. Shankland, C.A., 401.

19. Light dues—Exemption—Order in Council of 16th May, 1893.—The mere fact that the master of a ship lands at a port a few persons whom he had previously taken on board, who paid no passage money, but who paid a sum of money each to the master for food provided by him, does not deprive the owner of the ship of the exemption from light dues which he would be entitled to under the Order in Council of the 16th May, 1893, when the ship touches at that port merely for the purpose of obtaining bunker coals.—Hay v. Trinity House Corporation, Q.B.D., 188.

20. Salvage—Service rendered under a contract for work and labour with third parties.—The plaintiffs, with the knowledge and assent of her owners, undertook to lift a sunken vessel, under a contract with the insurers, who advanced to the plaintiffs before the work commenced 40 per cent. of the amount for which the vessel was insured. The vessel was successfully raised, but the operation of lifting proved more costly than was anticipated, and some of the underwriters in the meantime became insolvent. In an action of salvage brought by the plaintiffs against the defendants as owners of the vessel,

Held, that the contract with the underwriters, which was not dependent on success, precluded the plaintiffs from asserting a maritime lien on the vessel, and claiming salvage remuneration from her owners.—Solway Prince, The, P.D. & AD.D.

21. Salvage—Tug—Scope of employment—Duty towards tow.—A tug, which had been engaged to attend a vessel into harbour, accompanied her to the entrance, when, a fog coming on and before the tug had made fast, the vessel went ashore and was in a position of danger. The tug assisted to get her off.

Held, that such service was outside the scope of her engagement, and that she was entitled to salvage.

Semble, the existence of such an engagement has no practical effect in diminishing the amount of the award.—Westburn, The, P.D. & AD.D.

22. Wages—Master's lien—Claim of mortgagee in possession—Priority.—While a master's lien for wages against his ship takes precedence of an ordinary claim by mortgagees, it does not take priority of any part of the mortgage debt, the payment of which the master has personally guaranteed to the mortgagees.—Bangor Castle, The, P.D. & AD.D.

23. Wreck—Obstruction in tidal river—Removal of wreck—Liability for expenses of removal—Owner, Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 27) s. 56—Aire and Calder Navigation Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 32), s. 47.—By section 47 of the Aire and Calder Navigation Act, 1889, if any vessel shall be sunk in any part of the navigation of the undertakers, and the owner shall not forthwith remove the same, the undertakers may remove, and may detain and sell the same in payment of their expenses, and they shall pay the overplus, if any, to the owner; and by section 56 of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Acts, 1847, "the harbour-master may remove any wreck or other obstruction in the harbour, and the expenses of removing any such wreck shall be repaid by the owner of the same."

Held, that, under both sections, the word "owner" means the person who was the owner of the vessel at the time when the expenses of removal were incurred, and not the person who was the owner when the vessel sank, and consequently that where the owner of a vessel, which had sunk in a tidal river, had completely abandoned all ownership in the vessel before the expenses of removal were incurred, he was not liable for such expenses.—Barraclough v. Brown, Q.B.D.

SOLICITOR:—

1. Agreement with client as to costs—Payment—Work done before the magistrates and quarter sessions in respect of a criminal charge—Jurisdiction to set aside—Solicitors and Attorneys Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 28), ss. 4, 8, 10.—A person, the subject of a charge of a criminal nature pending before a stipendiary magistrate, retained a solicitor to defend him, and paid him £25 down, and signed a document by which he agreed to pay for costs a lump sum of £75 in addition to the £25 already paid. He subsequently was committed for trial at quarter sessions, and was there acquitted.

Held, that although the above-mentioned document was not signed by the solicitor, yet that it was an agreement within the meaning of the Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1870.

Held, further, that the High Court has jurisdiction to set aside such an agreement, and to order delivery of a bill of costs, and taxation.—Jones, Re, CH.D. STIRLING, J., 10.

2. Application to committee of Incorporated Law Society—Allegations against solicitor—No primâ facie case of professional misconduct—Jurisdiction of committee—Discretion—Solicitors Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 65), s. 13.—On an application under section 13 of the Solicitors Act, 1888, to the committee of the Incorporated Law Society appointed under the Act, that a solicitor might be required to answer allegations of professional misconduct contained in an affidavit, the committee were of opinion that the affidavit disclosed no primâ facie case of professional misconduct, and the committee declined to proceed further with the hearing of the complaint.

Held, that an application for a mandamus to the committee to hear and determine the matters complained of failed on two grounds—first, that the committee had a discretionary power to decline to proceed with the hearing if they were of opinion that the applicant's affidavit disclosed no primâ facie case of professional misconduct; secondly, that there was another remedy open to the applicant equally convenient and beneficial—viz., an application to the court.—Reg. v. Incorporated Law Society, Q.B.D.

3. Costs—Business in magistrates' court and court of quarter sessions—Agreement as to costs—Jurisdic- tion of High Court to set aside—Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 28), ss. 4, 8, 10, 15.—A document signed by a client alone relating to the payment of costs may be "an agreement in writing" within section 4 of the Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1870.

Such an agreement relating to business done by a solicitor in a police court or in a court of quarter sessions is subject to taxation in the usual way, and may be examined, and, if necessary, set aside by a judge of the High Court.

The expressions "the court" or "a judge" in the Act of 1870 are inapplicable to a police magistrate or a court of quarter sessions, and are only applicable to a court of law or equity having, in the ordinary exercise of its jurisdiction, power to set aside such agreements.

So held, affirming Stirling, J., ante, p. 10.—Jones, Re, C.A., 146.

4. Costs—Payment of costs to solicitor—Judgment reversed on appeal—Order on solicitor to repay the costs—Jurisdiction.—Where the Court of Appeal allowed an appeal with costs, and after notice that a petition of appeal to the House of Lords had been lodged, the solicitors for the successful party obtained payment of the costs from the other party under threat of execution, and the House of Lords subsequently reversed the order of the Court of Appeal with costs,

Held, that the solicitors could not be ordered to refund the costs so received by them.

Semble, that the Court of Appeal had no jurisdiction to entertain the application.

Fitzmaurice v. Jordan, 32 L. R. Ir. 112, 41 W. R. Dig. 189, dissented from.—Hood-Barrs v. Heriot (No. 2), C.A., 487.

5. Costs—Taxation—Agreement—Settled account—Previous payment—The Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73). s. 41—The Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 44), s. 8.—Where there is an agreement as to costs between a solicitor and his client the court can refer that to the taxing master to ascertain whether it is fair and reasonable, and if not, it is not to be treated as binding upon the client.

A settled account, though coupled with the retainer of agreed costs, is not payment as between solicitor and client unless a proper bill is delivered.

Decision of Chitty, J., ante, p. 404, affirmed.

Hitchcock v. Stretton, 40 W. R. 555, [1892] 2 Ch. 343, explained; Re Frape, 41 W. R. 417, [1893] 2 Ch. 284, distinguished.—Baylis, In re, C.A., 533.

6. Costs — Taxation — Common order — Moneys alleged to have been received by solicitor for client—Counsel's fees—Set-off—General account—Practice.—The clause in the common order to tax a solicitor's bill of costs, which provides that the "solicitor do give credit for all sums of money by him received of or on account of" the client, must be read as including and as confined to all moneys which the solicitor in his character of solicitor or agent of the client has received of or on account of, or is legally or equitably liable to pay over to such client and against which (if sued for by the client) the solicitor could set off his costs when taxed, but credit need not be given by the solicitor for moneys received by him on account of fees owing to the client as counsel in respect of matters not connected with the bill of costs.—Le Brasseur, Re, Terrell, Ex parte, C.A.

7. Costs—Taxation—Common order for taxation obtained on behalf of a client of unsound mind not so found—Client subsequently found lunatic—Discharge of order—Duty of solicitor to disclose facts.—A summons in lunacy having been issued against A. for the appointment of a receiver and manager of A.'s estate, A. instructed B., a solicitor, to act for her. B., on behalf of A., obtained ex parte against C. & Co., A.'s former solicitors, an order for the delivery and taxation of C. & Co.'s bill of costs against A., but did not disclose the pendency of the summons in lunacy. A. was subsequently found a lunatic. C. & Co. applied for the discharge of the said order, and that B. should pay the costs.

Held, that the order must be discharged; but

Held, that as there was no evidence that B. at the time he obtained the order knew that A. was of unsound mind, and as he acted in good faith, he ought not to be ordered to pay the costs.—Armstrong, Re, CH.D. STIRLING, J., 281.

8. Costs—Taxation— Conducting sale—Auctioneer—Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881.—A solicitor who pays the auctioneer's fees on a sale by auction may be entitled to the scale fee for conducting the sale. Where the auctioneer's fees are paid by the purchaser, the solicitor of the vendor is not entitled to a scale fee.

The conducting fee must be arrived at by adding together the value of the lots sold and the reserve price of the unsold lots, and not by making a minimum charge of £5 in respect of each lot.—Cholditch v. Jones, CH.D. NORTH, J., 124.

9. Costs — Taxation — Remuneration — Debenture trust deed — Mortgage — Scale fee— Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 44)—General Order, 1882, r. 2 (a) (c); Schedule I., Part I.—The costs of the preparation and execution of a debenture trust deed, which was intended to be a mortgage security for moneys advanced, but under which no debentures were in fact ever issued, should be taxed under rule 2 (c) of the General Order made in pursuance of the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881.—Bircham, Re, C.A.

10. Costs— Taxation— Remuneration— Long lease not at rack rent—Money premium as well—Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881 — General order—Schedule I., Part I., rr. 7, 8—Schedule I., Part II., r. 5.—Where a long lease, not at a rack rent, is granted in consideration of a money payment or premium, the lessor's solicitor is entitled to be paid both the scale fee payable under Schedule I., Part II. (2nd scale), in respect of the rent, and the scale fee payable under Schedule I., Part I., on sales, purchases, and mortgages, in respect of the money payment or premium.—Hellard, Re, CH.D. NORTH, J., 475.

11. Costs—Taxation— Remuneration—Scale fee—Grant of easement — Conveyance — Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 44)—General Order, Schedule I., Part I.—A deed creating an easement for the first time does not come within the scale of charges prescribed by Schedule I., Part I., of the General Order made in pursuance of the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881.

12. Costs—Taxation—Several bills—One barred by the Statute of Limitations—Common order to tax—Vendor and purchaser—Several lots purchased—One or more bills—Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, General Order, Sched. I., Part I., r. 8—The taxing master ought to tax statute-barred costs, and leave the court to determine whether they ought to be paid.

Under a common order to tax obtained on application by the client, the client must pay what is found due on taxation; if the client wishes to raise the Statute of Limitations, he must obtain a special order.

Where several lots are bought for small sums, each having a separate title and separate abstract, a solicitor is entitled to the minimum scale fee in each case.—Margetts Re, CH.D. KEKEWICH, J., 462.

13. Costs — Taxation — Several bills — Order of course to tax one only.—A solicitor to whom a balance of £101 15s. was due upon seven bills, gave up the client's documents upon payment of £50, undertaking to return any sum found due from him upon taxation. He afterwards wrote accepting the £50 in full discharge of all claims. No answer was given to this letter, but a common order of course to tax one only of the bills was obtained by the client.

Held, that the order of course was right under the circumstances.—Ward Re, C.A., 484.

14. Gift to Solicitor's wife—No independent advice —Presumption of undue influence.—In the case of an irrevocable gift by a client to a solicitor, or to the solicitor's wife, made without independent advice, it is an irrebuttable presumption of law that there was undue influence on the part of the solicitor.—Liles v. Terry, C.A., 116.

15. Improper use of solicitor's name—Fund in court—Order for payment out on fraudulent petition — Dummy petitioner — Partnership — Liability to refund.—H., a solicitor, presented a fictitious petition, and thereby obtained an order for the payment out of a fund in court to a person whom he identified at the Paymaster-General's office as the supposed petitioner. H. had made use of the name of "C. & Co." (a firm of solicitors consisting of C. and G.) as if they were acting as solicitors for the supposed petitioner, and had briefed counsel in their name, and had done all this without the knowledge of either C. or G.

On the 10th of August the Paymaster-General's cheque was paid into, and cleared by, a bank in which H. had caused an account to be opened in the name of the supposed petitioner. On the 12th of August a large part thereof was drawn out of the said bank by the supposed petitioner, leaving, however, a sum of £2,000 still undrawn. On the same day C. was first told by H. that he had used the name of C.'s firm as solicitors in formal proceedings now completed and that there was a cheque at the Paymaster's office for the costs of C.'s firm. C. thereupon went at once to the Paymaster's office, obtained the cheque, and paid it into the account of his firm.

Subsequently to the 12th of August part of the £2,000 remaining in the bank was drawn out by the supposed petitioner, and although C. was then aware that his firm's name had been used without authority by H., he was ignorant of the fraud which had been committed by H. C.'s partner, G., knew absolutely nothing of the matter.

The Treasury having made good the fund,

Held, (1) that it was the duty of C., as an officer of the court, when, on the 12th of August, he first knew that his firm's name had been used by H. without authority in proceedings in court, to have at once informed the judge of that fact, and if he had done so that the £2,000 then in the bank would have been saved; (2) that C. by accepting the cheque for costs and placing it to the account of his firm had thereby condoned on behalf of his firm the unauthorized use by H. of the firm's name; and (3) that G., C.'s partner, was together with C. jointly and severally liable to make good to the Treasury so much of £2,000 as was drawn out after the 12th of August.

Re Dangar's Trusts, 37 W. R. 651, 41 Ch. D. 178, approved.—Marsh v. Joseph, CH.D. KEKEWICH, J., 462.

16. Lien—Charging order—Assignment of sum recovered—Notice—Solicitors Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 127), s. 28.—An action of damage by collision was compromised on the terms that the defendants, the owners of the steamship Paris, should pay to the plaintiff 50 per cent. of the damages sustained by the plaintiff's vessel, each party to bear their own costs of the action, and the amount of the damages to be ascertained by an arbitrator. Prior to the commencement of the action the defendants' solicitors had been pressing the plaintiff for a settlement of claims of clients of theirs against him, and for their own costs when acting for him; and the plaintiff, after the compromise of the action, but before the arbitrator made his award, wrote to the defendants' solicitors that he agreed to their settling the amount due to themselves and to certain named clients of theirs "out of the money coming in from Paris s.s."

By his award the arbitrator fixed the sum due from the defendants to the plaintiff, which, with the agreed costs of the reference, made a total of £405 11s. 8d., and the defendants' solicitors forwarded to the plaintiff's solicitors a cheque for a small amount as being the balance out of the above total sum after paying the named clients and themselves. The plaintiff's solicitors took out a summons under section 28 of the Solicitors Act, 1860, for a charging order. It was admitted that there was no collusion, and it was agreed that the award should be treated as a decree.

Held, that the plaintiff's solicitors in the action were entitled to an order charging the sum recovered with the plaintiff's costs to be taxed as between solicitor and client, on the ground that the fund recovered by the exertions of the plaintiff's solicitors was fixed, though not worked out, at the date of the compromise, and that the subsequent assignment of the fund was void under the statute as being an act done operating to defeat the right of the solicitors to a lien for costs—of which right, by reason of the fund being a sum recovered in the action, the defendants' solicitors, and their clients through them, were affected with notice.—Paris, The, P.D. & AD.D.

17. Misconduct—Application to Law Society— Primâ facie case—Jurisdiction of committee—Solicitors Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 65), s. 13.—Where the Committee of the Incorporated Law Society, upon an application under section 13 of the Solicitors Act, 1888, alleging professional misconduct against a solicitor, are of opinion that the affidavits disclose no primâ facie case of misconduct, they need not hear any further evidence or take any further proceedings in the matter, or make any report.—Reg. v. Incorporated Law Society, C.A., 307.

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE:—

1. Parol agreement — Possession prior to agreement—Continuance in possession—Statute of Frauds (29 Car. 2, c. 3), ss. 1, 4.—Where a tenant in possession of premises continues in possession after a verbal agreement for a lease exceeding three years, and such possession is unequivocally referable to the verbal agreement, it is an act of part performance sufficient to take it out of the Statute of Frauds.—Hodson v. Heuland, CH.D. KEKEWICH, J., 684.

2. Vendor and purchaser—Defaulting defendant—Motion for judgment—Conveyance to be executed as an escrow and handed over to defendant on payment of purchase money to plaintiff—Order for payment to plaintiff.—In a vendor's action for specific performance, the purchaser, the defendant, not having complied with the decree, was ordered to pay the purchase money into court within a limited time. The defendant not having complied with this order the plaintiff then applied for an order for the payment of the amount to the plaintiff, so that if default were made a writ of fi. fa. might issue.

The court made an order for a conveyance to be executed as an escrow by the plaintiff, to be delivered on payment of the purchase money; and for payment to the plaintiff by the defendant at a time and place to be fixed by the judge after the execution of the conveyance. The conveyance having been accordingly executed as an escrow, the defendant was ordered to pay the purchase money with interest, to the plaintiff, within one month from the date of the order.

Practice—Special leave to appeal—Tasmanian Act, No. 10 of 1858, ss. 5, 8.—By Tasmanian Act No. 10 of 1858, s. 5, disputes concerning lands yet ungranted by the Crown are referred to the Supreme Court, whose decision is to be final; and by s. 8 the court is directed to be guided by equity and good conscience only, and by the best evidence procurable, even if not required or admissible in ordinary cases, and not to be bound by strict rules of law or equity or by any legal forms.

Held, that the Crown's prerogative to grant special leave to appeal is inapplicable to a decision so authorized.

TELEGRAPH:—

Licensee—Tape instrument—Stock exchange—Contract—Injunction—Telegraph Act, 1863 (c. 112), ss. 2, 3, 41; 1868 (c. 110), s. 2; 1869 (c. 73), ss. 4, 5.—The defendants, who were licensees of the Postmaster-General under section 5 of the Telegraph Act, 1869, supplied by means of tape recording instruments, members of the Stock Exchange with the current prices each day quoted on the Stock Exchange, which prices were obtained by the permission of the Stock Exchange. The defendants contracted with the plaintiff, who was not a member of the Stock Exchange, to supply him with similar information by means of a tape recording instrument.

The Stock Exchange, having required the defendants to cease to supply outside brokers with the information collected in the Stock Exchange building, the defendants disconnected the plaintiffs tape recording instrument.

Held, that there was no duty imposed on the defendants under the licence they held from the Postmaster-General to supply the plaintiff with the information required.

Held also, that as the contract entered into by the defendants with the plaintiff was not expressed to be made subject to the rules of the Stock Exchange, the plaintiff was entitled to damages but not to an injunction, the contract being for personal service in reference to a chattel.—Cochrane v. Exchange Telegraph Co., CH.D. TENANT IN COMMON:—

Sale by mortgagee—Improvements.—On a sale by a paramount mortgagee one-half the expenditure in improvements made by a person who was tenant in common in fee of one moiety and tenant for life of the other moiety was allowed out of the proceeds of sale, but it was provided that the sum so allowed should not exceed one-half the amount actually expended.—Cook's Mortgage, Re, Lawledge v. Tyndall, CH.D. THEATRE:—

Public entertainment—Licence to perform stage plays—Licence granted conditionally on undertaking not to apply for excise licence—Discretion of licensing committee—Theatres Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 68).—On an application for a theatre licence the licensing committee granted it on condition that the applicant did not apply for an excise licence, they being of opinion that there were sufficient public-houses in the immediate neighbourhood.

Held, that the licensing committee had properly exercised their discretion, and that they were justified in taking into consideration the fact that an excise licence might be applied for, and, in view of the facts of the case, in imposing a condition on the granting of the theatre licence.—Reg. v. Yorkshire West Riding County Council, Q.B.D., 650.

TRADE-MARK:—

1. Registration—Descriptive word—Fancy word—Bovril—Patents Act, 1883 (c. 57), s. 64 (1).—The fact that a portion of the word "Bovril" has some connection with "ox" does not, the whole word being meaningless, make the work so descriptive as to prevent its being registered as a "fancy word," even though it is applied to extracts of meat.—Bovril Trade-Mark, Re, C.A.

2. Registration—"Fancy word not in common use"—"Shakespeare" cigars—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 64, sub-section 1 (c).—The word "Shakespeare" as applied to cigars is not a fancy word not in common use within the meaning of section 64, sub-section 1 (c), of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883.—Banks and James' Trade-Mark (Shakespeare case) CH.D. CHITTY, J., 32.

3. Registration—Name—Fictitious character—"Trilby" in ordinary type—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Acts, 1883-1888 (46 & 47 Vict. c 57), s. 64 (1) (a), (b), (d), (e).—The names of imaginary persons are "words" within clause (e) of section 64 of the Patents, &c., Acts, 1883-1888, and not names of "individuals" within clause (a). They may, therefore, be registered, though not "printed, impressed, or woven in a particular or distinctive manner."

So held by Lindley and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.; Kay, L.J., dissenting.

Decision of North, J., ante, p. 269, reversed.—Holt v. Saunders (Trilby case), C.A., 369.

4. Registration—Restrictions upon—"Representations of the Royal Crown"—Instructions issued by Comptroller to persons wishing to register trade-marks.—There is no positive rule binding upon the court or the Board of Trade prohibiting the registration of a trade-mark containing the representation of a crown. The instructions issued by the Comptroller-General of Trade-Marks to applicants for registration, containing a regulation that "representations of the Royal Crown" will not be registered as trade-marks or as prominent parts of trade-marks unless the marks have been used before the 13th of August, 1875, do not prohibit every form of crown, but only representations of the crown as it appears on the Royal Arms, namely, a circlet surmounted by two arches.

Whether these instructions are binding upon the court or not, the practice in the Trade-Mark Office, which has been based upon them since 1875, ought not now to be departed from.—Konig and Ebhardt's Application, Re, CH.D. STIRLING, J.

5. Registration—"Words"—Burmese words—Disclaimer—Risk of deception—Undertaking that trade-mark shall be used only on goods exported to particular country—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Acts, 1883 and 1888 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57; 51 & 52 Vict. c. 50).—Burmese words expressed in Oriental characters are "words" within the meaning of section 10 (e) of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1888. Regard must therefore be had, in deciding whether a trade-mark containing such words shall be registered, to the meaning of such words; and accordingly, on the principle of the Red Star case, 42 W. R. 420, [1894] 2 Ch. 26, when there are already on the register trade-marks containing a representation of a golden fan, a trade-mark including the Burmese words for "The Golden Fan Brand" will not (at any rate without a disclaimer of the exclusive right to use those words, as to the effect of which, quære) be allowed to be registered. The consent of the owners of the trade-marks resembling that for which registration is sought is not a sufficient ground for allowing such registration, for the court has also to protect the public from being deceived.

In such a case the court has no jurisdiction to allow registration upon an undertaking that the trade-mark shall be used only upon goods exported to a particular country, even if in that country there is no risk of deception.—Dewhurst's Application, Re, C.A., 672.

TRADE NAME:—

1. Accurate and true description of goods—Right to use same name—Name calculated to mislead.—The respondents sold their goods under a name which was an accurate and true description of them, but the name used was that by which the goods of another manufacturer had been known to the trade, and the result of doing this was to cause purchasers to believe that they were buying the goods of the appellants.

Held, that the respondents could be restrained from so selling their goods, and an injunction was accordingly granted.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (43 W. R. 294, [1895] 1 Q. B. 286) reversed.—Reddaway v. Banham, H.L., 638.

2. Injunction—"Yorkshire Relish"—Probability of deception—Passing off.—Where a man has long been the sole maker of a particular kind of article which he has always called by some name by which his goods are known and usually called by ordinary buyers, if it is impossible for a rival manufacturer profitably to use the old name and at the same time so to distinguish the two classes of goods as to prevent the goods of the rival manufacturer from being mistaken for those of the original manufacturer, the latter will be entitled to protection, and it is not necessary for him to prove fraudulent conduct on the part of the rival manufacturer.

The plaintiff had for a number of years sold a sauce under the name of "Yorkshire Relish," though his trade-mark consisting of those words had been expunged from the register. The defendants began selling, under the name of "Yorkshire Relish," a sauce of their own manufacture which, though not identical with the plaintiff's sauce, was very similar to it. There were considerable differences between the labels on the plaintiff's and defendants' bottles, but the evidence showed that in spite of these differences the defendants' sauce could be and was easily mistaken by ordinary purchasers for the plaintiff's.

Held, affirming the decision of Stirling, J., that the plaintiff was entitled to an injunction restraining the defendants from selling their sauce without better distinguishing it from the plaintiff's sauce.—Powell v. Birmingham Vinegar Brewery Co., C.A., 688.

TRADE UNION:—

Strike—Picketing—Inducing persons not to contract with plaintiff—Intent to injure—Malice—"Watching or Besetting"—Interlocutory injunction—Trade Union Act, 1871 (c. 31)—Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875 (c. 86), ss. 3, 7.—The defendants, a trade union, ordered a strike against the plaintiff, a manufacturer, and also against S., a person who made goods for the plaintiff only; and their pickets had watched and beset the works of the plaintiff and S. for the purpose of compelling workpeople to abstain from working for the plaintiff.

Held, that this kind of picketing and the strike against S. for the indirect purpose of injuring the plaintiff were illegal acts, and an interlocutory injunction was granted to restrain the trade union and its agents from watching or besetting the plaintiffs' works for the purpose of persuading or otherwise preventing persons from working for him, or for any other purpose than in order merely to obtain or communicate information. A similar injunction was granted in respect of the premises belonging to S.—Lyons v. Wilkins, C.A.

TRAMWAY:—

1. Bye-law—Refusal to pay the fare in default of producing ticket.—A bye-law made by a tramways company provided as follows: "Each passenger shall show his ticket (if any), when required so to do, to the conductor or any duly authorized servant of the company, and shall also, when required so to do, either deliver up his ticket or pay the fare legally demandable for the distance travelled over by such passenger"; another bye-law imposed a penalty for breach of any of the bye-laws. A passenger, who had already paid his fare, was unable to produce his ticket, having inadvertently torn it up, and refused to pay the fare a second time. He was summoned under the penalty bye-law.

Held, that the magistrate was bound to convict him.—Hanks v. Bridgman, Q.B.D., 285.

2. Bye-law—Validity of—Passenger refusing to show his ticket—Tramways Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 78), s. 46.—A bye-law of a tramway company, made in pursuance of the powers conferred by section 46 of the Tramways Act, 1870, provided that "Each passenger shall show his ticket (if any) when required to do so, to the conductor or any duly authorized servant of the company"; and a penalty was attached to a breach of the bye-law.

Held, that the bye-law was a reasonable bye-law "for regulating the travelling in or upon" a tramcar, and was valid, and that a passenger who had duly paid his fare and received a ticket, but who had refused to show the same to an inspector of the company, ought to have been convicted under the bye-law for refusing to show his ticket. —Lowe v. Volp, Q.B.D., 442.

3. Enforcing penalties against tramways company — Distress—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, s. 43—Debentures—Receiver and manager—Tramways Act, Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 78), ss. 28, 56.—There is nothing against public policy in allowing penalties imposed for the protection and the safety of the public to be enforced by distress and sale of the goods and chattels of a tramway company.—Pegge v. Neath Tramways Co., CH.D. NORTH, J., 72.

TROVER.—See CONTRACT, 6; DETINUE.

TRUSTEE:—

1. Account—Breach of trust—Trustee Act, 1888 (c. 59), s. 8.—The plaintiff, an annuitant, claimed an account of the rents and profits of the real estate of testatrix received by the defendant as trustee, and an account of what was due from the defendant.

Held, that in taking the account the chief clerk should not allow any claim for moneys proved to have been parted with by defendant more than six years before the issue of the writ; such claims being barred by the Trustee Act, 1888.—How v. Winterton (Earl), CH.D. KEKEWICH, J.

2. Breach of trust—Appointment not executed by joint appointors—Trust funds invested in assignment of appointed charge—Defect in title—Solicitor employed by trustees—Non-liability of trustees.—The trustees of a marriage settlement invested part of the trust funds on an assignment of an appointed share of another fund. The appointment purported to be made in exercise of a joint power, but the deed of appointment had not in fact been executed by one of the joint appointors. The trustees had employed a competent solicitor to act for them in preparing the assignment, and to transact the legal business in connection with it.

Held, that the trustees were not liable to make good any loss arising by reason of the invalidity of the appointment.—Rochfort v. Seaton, V.C. (Ir.).

3. Breach of trust—Fraud of agent—Liability of principal—Statute of Limitations (21 Jac. 1, c. 16)—"Party or privy to" fraud—Trusts property still retained by trustee—Trustee Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 59), s. 8.—The respondents, who were first mortgagees of property, and unaware that there was a second mortgage, sold under their power of sale in 1878. S., the mortgagor's solicitor, acted for them, and received the purchase-money, part of which he paid to the respondents in payment of what was due to them, the balance he retained for his own purposes. The appellant was second mortgagee, and S. concealed his fraud by continuing to send him the interest as heretofore. In 1892 S. became bankrupt, and the true state of things becoming known to the appellant he brought the present action against the respondents for an account and payment of what was due on the second mortgage.

Held, that the right of action arose in 1878; that S. could not be considered as the respondents' agent for the purposes of this fraud; that the concealment was entirely and exclusively the action of S.; that the balance of the purchase-money could not be considered as "still retained" by the respondents; consequently section 8 of the Trustee Act, 1888, applied, and the respondents were under no liability.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (42 W. R. 274, [1894] 1 Ch. 599) affirmed.—Thorne v. Heard, H.L., 155.

4. Breach of trust—Investment — Unauthorized investment—Liability—Trustee Act (1893) Amendment Act, 1894 (57 Vict. c. 10).—Section 4 of the Trustee Act (1893) Amendment Act, 1894, is not retrospective so as to relieve trustees from an obligation (e.g., a breach of trust in retaining investments not authorized by law or by the instrument creating the trust) existing at the date of the passing of the Act.—Chapman, Re, Cocks v. Chapman, CH.D. KEKEWICH, J., 311.

5. Breach of trust—Solicitor— Trustee de son tort — Constructive Trustee— Trust funds passing through solicitor's firm—Liability of partner.—It is not within the scope of the implied authority of a partner in a solicitor's business to constitute himself a constructive trustee so as to bind his partner (who is not aware of the dealings by which the constructive trust is established) and make him also liable as a constructive trustee.

B., a partner in a firm of solicitors, acting as well for the de facto trustees as for the proposed new trustees of a marriage settlement, before the appointment of the new trustees, invested the trust funds on mortgages which resulted in a loss to the trust estate. In an action brought to make the solicitor and his partner liable to refund to the trust estate losses which had occurred in consequence of improper investments, Held (reversing the decision of North, J., [1895] 2 Ch. 69), that on the evidence the solicitor had acted throughout merely as the solicitor of the trustees, and that neither he nor his partner could be held liable as a constructive trustee.—Mara v. Browne, C.A., 330.

6. Breach of trust—Trustee beneficiary—Indemnity —Right to contribution from co-trustee.—If one of two trustees who have been guilty of a breach of trust is also a beneficiary, he is liable to make good out of his share and to the extent of it the whole of the loss that has accrued to the trust fund, and can claim no contribution from his co-trustee when the breach of trust was committed for his benefit.—Chillingworth v. Chambers, C.A., 388.

7. Company undertaking the business of trustee— Remuneration—Increased remuneration—Credit of company.—When a company which makes it its business to undertake trusts demands, in view of increased responsibilities, increased remuneration, such a demand, especially if not persisted in, is not such a breach of trust as to justify its removal from the position of trustee.

Also, the mere fact of the credit of such company being impaired will not justify its removal if it cannot be shown that the interest of the cestui que trust has suffered or is likely to suffer thereby.—Assets Realization Co. v. Trustees Insurance Corporation, CH.D. ROMER, J., 126.

8. Co-trustee—Contribution—Employment of outside broker—Negligence—Statute of Limitations— Trustee Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 59), s. 8, sub-section 1 (a) (b).—The employment by a trustee of an outside broker is not in itself a departure from his duty as a trustee. The right to contribution between co-trustees is governed by the same principles as regulate the right to contribution between co-sureties. The principle laid down as regards co-sureties in Wolmershausen v. Gullick, [1893] 2 Ch. 514, accordingly applies to the case of a trustee suing a co-trustee for contribution in respect of a liability incurred from loss occasioned to the trust estate by their joint default; and the Statute of Limitations does not begin to run as between the co-trustees until the claim of the cestui que trust is established against the trustee claiming contribution.—Robinson v. Harkin, CH.D. STIRLING, J., 702.

9. Disclaimer—Partial disclaimer—Vendor and purchaser—Will—Trust for sale.—A person resident abroad, who has been nominated as trustee, cannot refuse to act as trustee for any part of the trust property situate without the bounds of the country where he is resident, and at the same time intermeddle in the trusts of that part of the trust property situate in that country. A document containing such a refusal is a partial disclaimer only of the office of trustee, and is nugatory. The disclaimer, in order to be valid, must be of the whole of the trusts.—Lord and Fullerton's Contract, Re, C.A., 195.

10. Discretion of trustees—Maintenance—Accumulations—Order.—A trustee who has, under the instrument of trust, a discretionary power of accumulating and investing as capital any portion of income unapplied for maintenance, does not exercise his discretion if he obeys an order of the court to accumulate the whole of the income of the fund until further order.

Whether a trustee who has exercised his discretion in accumulating income as capital can afterwards apply the capitalized accumulations for maintenance, quære.—Wise, Re, Jackson v. Parrott, CH.D. NORTH, J., 310.

11. Infant—Infant tenant in tail in possession—Vesting order—Form of order—Trustee Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 53), ss. 31, 32, 50.—The effect of an order under the Trustee Act, 1893, appointing a person to convey the estate of an infant tenant in tail in possession for all such estate as the infant could if of full age convey, is to bar the estate tail and the remainders over; and no reference is needed to a disentailing deed or the Fines and Recoveries Act (as set out in Seton on Judgments, 5th ed., vol. 2, p. 1067, Form No. 21).—Montagu, Re, Faber v. Montagu, CH.D. KEKEWICH, J., 583.

12. Investment—Discretion—Commission or bonus paid to trustee—Liability to make good loss.—A testator gave the residue of his estate to trustees to invest in or upon such stocks, funds, and securities as they "shall think fit." The trustees invested £3,000, part of the trust estate, upon debentures at par of the New Travellers' Club, one of the trustees receiving, without the knowledge of his co-trustee, a bonus or commission of £300 on the transaction. The co-trustee assented to the investment, thinking it would benefit the trust estate. As a matter of fact the debentures were not, and never had been, of par value, and at the time the action was brought were of little or no market value.

Held, (1) that "as they shall think fit" meant "as they shall honestly think fit"; (2) that the commission or bonus of £300 received by one of the trustees was a bribe, and therefore that that trustee did not "honestly think fit," and that consequently he was liable to make good the loss occasioned to the trust estate by the investment of the £3,000; (3) that the co-trustee (on the facts) acted bonâ fide, and therefore did "honestly" think fit, and that consequently his estate was not liable to make good the loss; (4) that the £300 commission was received by the trustee as agent of the trust estate, and consequently must be paid by him thereto.—Smith, Re, Smith v. Thompson, CH.D. KEKEWICH, J., 270.

13. Investment—Power to invest in the trustees' names—Securities to bearer—Power to postpone conversion—Discretion—Majority.—R., by will, gave his residuary estate to trustees upon trust to convert and to invest in their or his names upon the public stocks, funds, or securities of Great Britain or of any foreign or colonial Government, and he gave them power to postpone for such time as should seem expedient the sale, conversion, or getting in of any part of the trust estate. The testator's estate consisted chiefly of foreign stocks and bonds, some of which were payable to bearer. The trustees retained these securities for some years, then one trustee wished to realize; the other three thought it best to further postpone the sale.

Held, on a summons taken out by the trustee who wished to realize, that under the power to invest in their names the trustees had not power to purchase foreign Government bonds payable to bearer; that they had power to postpone the sale of such bonds possessed by the testator at his death, but that this power to postpone could only be exercised by the trustees unanimously, and if one trustee objected the bond or other unauthorized securities must be converted.—Roth, Re, Goldberger v. Roth, CH.D. NORTH, J.

14. Mortgage by cestui que trust—Power to first mortgagee to give receipt for payment of the fund—Puisne incumbrancers—Whether first mortgagee can compel trustees of fund to pay whole fund mortgaged to him.—Where the cestui que trust of a fund in the hands of trustees assigned the trust premises by way of first mortgage with power to the mortgagee to demand payment of, and give receipts for, the same; and afterwards executed further mortgages of the trust premises:

Held, following the settled practice applicable to the case of a fund in court, that the trustees of the fund, having notice of puisne incumbrancers, could not be compelled by the first mortgagee to pay over to him the whole fund, but only what was due to him on his security.—Bell, Re, Jeffery v. Sayles, C.A., 99.

15. New trustee—Appointment—Person nominated for that purpose—Trustee Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 53), s. 10.—Where under a trust instrument a named person has power to appoint new trustees in certain events, on the happening of an event not specified in the instrument, but specified in the Trustee Act, 1893, the power of appointment is not exercisable by the named person.—Wheeler and Dr. Rochow's Trusts, Re, CH.D. KEKEWICH, J., 270.

16. New trustee—Appointment—Trustee resident "abroad"—Solicitor for the tenant for life—Settled Land Acts, 1882, 1890.—The tenant for life under a will was empowered to appoint a new trustee of the will in the place of any trustee thereof who should, inter alia, be "abroad." In 1893 P., a trustee of the will, went to live at Lisieux, in Normandy, a place within sixteen hours' rail of London. He continued to attend meetings of the trustees, with rare exceptions; and declared his intention of returning to reside in England in 1898. In 1895 the tenant for life, in exercise of her power, appointed her solicitor a new trustee of the will in the place of P., on the ground that P. was "abroad" within the meaning of that power.

On a summons taken out by the trustees to test the validity of the new appointment,

Held, that P. was "abroad" within the meaning of the power, and that the tenant for life was consequently entitled to appoint a new trustee in his place.

Held, also, that though the court would not itself appoint or confirm the appointment of the tenant for life's solicitor as a trustee of a settlement, yet it would not interfere with such an appointment when made by the tenant for life in good faith.—Stamford (Earl of) Re, Payne v. Stamford, CH.D. STIRLING, J., 249.

17. New trustee—Decrease in number of trustees—Vesting order—Jurisdiction—Trustee Act, 1893, ss. 26, 35.—Where one of four trustees of a settlement has been adjudicated a bankrupt and absconded, the court has jurisdiction to make an order vesting the estate in the other three trustees, although the number of trustees be thereby diminished.—Lee's Settlement Trusts, Re, CH.D. CHITTY, J., 680.

18. Settlement — Breach of trust — Satisfaction — Advancement. — By a marriage settlement certain sums of stock, the property of the wife, were vested in trustees upon trust for the wife for life for her separate use, and after her death for the husband for life, and after the death of the survivor (in default of appointment) for the children of the marriage in equal shares. There was issue of the marriage two sons only, each of whom attained his majority and married. The father obtained sole control of the trust funds, and appropriated them to his own use, but at the same time made handsome settlements on the two sons upon their respective marriages, and also various other gifts and advances to them out of his own property. The marriage settlement of one of the sons included a sum of stock which was an investment of part of the proceeds of the misappropriated trust funds. The various gifts and advances to the sons did not, in respect either of quantity of interest or amount, correspond with the shares to which they became entitled in the trust funds. The mother and sons all predeceased the father, who subsequently died.

Held, that the facts and correspondence rebutted any presumption that the father made the settlements and advances in satisfaction of any part of the trust funds, and that his estate was liable to make good to the representatives of the two sons their shares in the trust funds misappropriated by him without accounting for the properties settled upon, or given or advanced to, the sons by the father, including the sum of stock comprised in the son's marriage settlement, which was an investment of part of the proceeds of the misappropriated trust funds.

Decision of North, J. (ante, p. 203) on this point reversed.

Held by North, J. (ante, p. 203), there is no resulting trust in favour of a father of land purchased by him in his son's name, to qualify the son to act as a justice of the peace, because beneficial occupation is necessary for such qualification.—Crichton v. Crichton, C.A.

19. Vesting order—Refusal by trustee to transfer stock for twenty-eight days.—A petition founded on the refusal for twenty-eight days to transfer stock under section 35 (2) (d) of the Trustee Act, 1893, must not be presented or served before the expiration of the twenty-eight days. On petition for such an order there is jurisdiction to order the trustee to pay the costs.—Knox's Trusts Re, C.A.

VENDOR and PURCHASER:—

1. Bankruptcy—Deed of assignment for benefit of creditors—Conveyance by trustee under deed of assignment—Concurrence of trustee in bankruptcy—13 Eliz. c. 5.—A trader unable to pay his debts executed a deed whereby he conveyed and assigned to a trustee for his creditors all his estate and effects, including his freehold dwelling-house and shop where he carried on his business, upon trust to permit him to carry on his business for the purpose of paying off his debts by certain instalments which he thereby covenanted to pay; and upon default in the payment of such instalments the trustee was empowered to enter into possession of the whole of the property and sell the same, and pay the creditors rateably out of the proceeds; and the trader thereby appointed the trustee his attorney for executing every document necessary or expedient for carrying into effect the trusts and provisions of the deed, which was registered under the Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1877. Five months after the date of the deed the trader made default in payment of the instalments, and the trustee entered into possession of the property comprised therein, and a month after such entry into possession by the trustee the trader was adjudged bankrupt.

Two months after the trader's bankruptcy the trustee under the deed sold the trader's house and shop by auction, and the purchaser required the concurrence of the trustee in bankruptcy in the conveyance of the property to him by the trustee under the deed. It was admitted that all the creditors of the trader did not assent to the deed.

Held, that, although the deed was not void under the statute of the 13 Eliz. c. 5, as there was nothing to show that the trader thereby intended to defeat, hinder, or delay his creditors, yet the purchaser was right in his contention that the concurrence of the trustee in bankruptcy in the conveyance to him was necessary to confer a good title to the property, as otherwise he would be liable to legal proceedings at the instance of such trustee.—Poppleton and Jones' Contract. Re, CH.D. NORTH, J.

2. Building estate—Building scheme—Restrictive covenants—Right to enforce covenants—Acquiescence in breach—Change in character of property.—A person who, by virtue of a building scheme, has a right to enforce a covenant prohibiting the carrying on of a trade or business upon certain land may lose that right by acquiescing in systematic breaches of the covenant, or by a total change in the character of the building estate. But the fact that on a part of the building estate remote from the plaintiff's property businesses have been carried on in breach of the covenant is not, unless it appears that the plaintiff knew of what was being done, proof of acquiescence by him; and a change in the character of the property must, to deprive the plaintiff of his right, be so complete as to make the object for which the covenant was imposed impossible of attainment.

Held, upon the facts of the particular case, that the plaintiff had not lost his right.

Duke of Bedford v. Trustees of the British Museum, 2 My. & K. 552; Sayers v. Collyer, 33 W. R. 91, 28 Ch. D. 103; and German v. Chapman, 26 W. R. 149, 7 Ch. D. 271, considered.—Knight v. Simmonds, C.A., 580.

3. Condition—Expenses of obtaining documents of title not in vendor's possession—Liability of purchaser where no special condition—Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 3, sub-section 6.—A purchaser of land or leaseholds under a contract which contains no special condition as to the expenses of procuring documents of title or information not in the vendor's possession is liable, under section 3, sub-section 6, of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, to pay the expenses of procuring or ascertaining the whereabouts of a document which is the root of the title abstracted.

In re Johnson and Tustin, 33 W. R. 737, 30 Ch. D. 42, and Moody to Yates, 33 W. R. 785, 30 Ch. D. 344, distinguished.—Stuart and Seadon's Contract, Re, C.A., 610.

4. Condition restricting objections to title—Specific performance—Bad holding title—Deposit—Right to return of.—The plaintiff offered for sale by auction a leasehold house which was purchased by the defendant. One of the conditions of sale provided that the purchaser should make no objection or requisition as to the title between the date of an under-lease and the date of an assignment of that under-lease, but should assume that the assignment vested in the assignee a good title for the residue of the term.

The defendant discovered that, owing to a breach of trust and the fraudulent concealment of a will during the period covered by the condition, the title offered by the plaintiff was positively bad even as a holding title. He therefore refused to complete.

The plaintiff brought an action for specific performance, and the defendant counter-claimed for a return of the deposit which he had paid.

Held, that the plaintiff was not entitled to specific performance; and that the defendant was not entitled to a return of the deposit.—Scott v. Alvarez (No. 2), C.A.

5. Gavelkind—Enfeoffment by infant—Insufficient consideration.—Where a vendor's title to gavelkind lands is derived from a conveyance and enfeoffment of the said lands respectively made by adults and infants, and where the said transaction shows on the face of it that the infants did not receive a proper proportion of the purchase money paid in respect thereof, a purchaser from the vendor cannot be compelled to accept such title.—Maskall and Goldfinch's Contract, Re, CH.D. STIRLING, J.

6. Lease—Agreement for sale of lease—Under-lease—Misdescription.—Under a contract of sale a vendor agreed to sell two messuages described as held by an indenture of lease dated the 1st of August, 1872, for the unexpired residue of the term of eighty years computed from the 15th of March, 1866. The title was to commence with the lease; and the purchaser was to be deemed to buy with full notice thereof. The lease contained covenants referring to the lessor and his superior landlord. The lease was in fact an underlease.

Held, that, as the purchaser could not be considered to have had notice that the property she was intending to purchase was in fact held by an under-lease, the representation that it was held by a lease was a fatal misdescription, and that a good title had not therefore been shown.—Broom v. Phillips, CH.D. KEKEWICH, J.

7. Leaseholds—Sale by administrator durante minore ætate—Power of sale.—An administrator durante minore ætate has for the time all the powers of an ordinary administrator, including a power to sell the estate if it is necessary in due course of administration, although not necessary for the payment of debts.—Thompson and McWilliam's Contract, C.A. (Ir.).

8. Leaseholds—Sale by auction—Onerous covenants—Non-disclosure by vendor—Constructive notice.—A., at a sale by auction in the City of London, bought from B. certain leasehold property. The lease contained onerous covenants of which no mention was made in the particulars and conditions, nor did the particulars or conditions state that the lease was open for inspection. A. had no actual knowledge of the contents of the lease. B. alleged that A. had had a fair opportunity of obtaining such knowledge, the lease being in fact open to inspection before the sale at the offices of B.'s solicitors in accordance with the usual custom, and being also brought by B.'s solicitor to the sale for inspection. A., however, was ignorant alike of these facts and of the custom.

On a summons by A. under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874,

Held, that A. was entitled to have the contract rescinded.—White and Smith's Contract, Re, CH.D. STIRLING, J., 424.

9. Memorandum in writing—Condition of the essence of the contract—Right of vendor to waive condition—Specific performance.—By a memorandum, signed by the plaintiff and the defendant, it was provided that the former should sell to the latter a leasehold house "subject to the preparation by my (the plaintiff's) solicitor of a formal contract." The plaintiff having brought an action for specific performance upon the memorandum,

Held, that this stipulation was a condition precedent to a concluded agreement between the parties; that it could not be waived by the plaintiff, as being for his exclusive advantage; and therefore that the action must fail.—Lloyd v. Nowell, CH.D. KEKEWICH, J., 43.

10. Misrepresentation—Laches—Rescission.—When a purchaser discovers that a representation made to him by a vendor is untrue, if the vendor suggests that, if time be given him, the representation may be cured, and the purchaser put in as good a position as if the representation had been true, the purchaser, by giving the vendor time, does not lose his right to rely on the misrepresentation and determine the contract if, at the end of the time, the vendor fails to make good his suggestion.—Tibbatts v. Boulter, CH.D. ROMER, J.

11. Settled land—Tenant for life—Improvement rent-charge—Release of part of land charged—Consent of incumbrancers—Improvement of Land Act, 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 114), ss. 68, 69—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), ss. 5, 30.—The tenant for life of an estate which was subject to an improvement rent-charge created under the Improvement of Land Act, 1864, agreed to sell a portion of the settled estate free from the rent-charge. The tenant for life proposed, with the consent of the owners of the rent-charge, to exonerate the land sold from the rent-charge by virtue of section 5 of the Settled Land Act, 1882; but the purchasers took the objection that under section 68 of the Improvement of Land Act, 1864, the consent of the Board of Agriculture (who now represented the commissioners referred to in the Act) must be obtained.

Held, that the consent of the Board of Agriculture was not necessary, and that a good title had been shown.—Strafford (Earl) and Maples' Contract, Re, C.A., 259.

12. Trustee—Married woman—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), ss. 1, 18, 24.—Land was conveyed by deed in 1885 to three trustees, one of whom was a female. In 1889 the female trustee married. In 1896 the three trustees contracted to sell the property.

Held, that the concurrence of the husband of the female trustee was necessary. — Harkness and Allsopp's Contract, Re, CH.D. NORTH, J., 683.

13. Will—Charge of legacies on residue—Power of sale to trustees—Concurrence of residuary devisees absolutely entitled.—A testator by his will, after directing payment of his debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and after making various pecuniary and specific bequests, devised and bequeathed the residue of his real and personal estate to trustees upon certain trusts as to specific parts, and the residue thereof he devised and bequeathed to certain persons equally, share and share alike; and the testator further declared that the trustees should have power to sell the whole or any part of his real estate at such times and in such manner as they should deem expedient, and should hold the proceeds upon the trusts of the will. The testator's personal estate was insufficient to pay the debts and expenses and provide for the legacies.

Held, that the trustees could under the power of sale make a valid assurance of freehold property comprised in the testator's residue to a purchaser without the concurrence of the residuary devisees. —Dyson and Fowke's Contract, Re, CH.D. KEKEWICH, J.

VOLUNTARY ASSOCIATION:—

Member—Retirement—Acceptance.—The members of a voluntary trade protection society became such by election, and paid an annual subscription, in return for which they were entitled to legal assistance for the purposes of their trade and to some other benefits. By the rules the members incurred no obligation beyond the payment of their subscriptions. The rules contained no provision as to the retirement or expulsion of members.

Held, that a member was entitled to retire at any time without any consent of the other members; that on the receipt by the society of a letter from a member stating his wish to retire, he at once ceased to be a member, without the necessity of the acceptance by the society of his resignation; that he could not before acceptance withdraw his resignation; and that he could not become a member again without re-election.—Finch v. Oake, C.A.

VOLUNTEER CORPS:—

Power to make rules—Failure of volunteer to become efficient—Loss of capitation grant—Rule ultra vires—Volunteer Act, 1863 (26 & 27 Vict. c. 65), s. 24.—By section 24 of the Volunteer Act, 1863, "The officers and volunteers belonging to a volunteer corps may from time to time make rules for the management of the property, finances, and civil affairs of the corps."

A volunteer corps made (inter alia) the following rule: "Any . . . member of the corps who shall fail to make himself efficient and to earn the Government capitation grant . . . shall pay to the funds of the corps a sum equal to the amount of Government capitation grant which he has in consequence failed to earn."

Held, that there was no power under the section to make such a rule, and that it was therefore ultra vires.—Reg. v. Lewis and Moss, Q.B.D.

WARRANTY.—See SALE OF GOODS, 4.

WATER:—

1. Metropolis—Constant supply of water—Failure of water company to give—Right of private individual, being aggrieved, to sue for penalties—Metropolis Water Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 113), ss. 7, 16, 44, 45—Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 17), s. 43.—When a water company which comes within the operation of the Metropolis Water Act, 1871, fails to give a constant supply of water within section 7 of the Act, a private individual who may be aggrieved in consequence of such non-supply cannot sue for the penalties imposed by section 16 of the Act. For such penalties for failure to give a constant supply to districts the metropolitan authority alone can sue, and if a private individual be aggrieved his remedy is not under the Act of 1871, but under section 43 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, under which section it is a condition precedent of his right to sue that he shall have paid or tendered the water rate in advance.—Kyffin v. East London Waterworks Co., Q.B.D., 446.

2. Watercourse—Water percolating underground—Malicious intention—Bradford Waterworks Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. cxxiv.), s. 49.—The legal right of a landowner to divert or take water which percolates underground in undefined channels into adjoining land is not affected by his motive for doing so.

The Bradford Waterworks Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. cxxiv.), s. 49, held to preserve these rights of the respondent.

Decision of the Court of Appeal, 43 W. R. 189, [1895] 1 Ch. 145, affirmed.—Bradford (Mayor of) v. Pickles, H.L., 190.

WEIGHTS and MEASURES.—See LOCAL GOVERNMENT, 3.

WILL:—

1. Absolute gift — Condition subsequent — Repugnancy.—A testator gave all his property, real and personal, to trustees for division among his children, their shares to be paid when they respectively attained twenty-eight. The will further contained a clause cutting down the children's shares to £1,000 each in the case of sons, and to £500 in the case of daughters, if any of them should embrace a religious life.

Held, following Saunders v. Vautier, Cr. and Ph. 240, that there was an absolute gift to the children vesting on the testator's death, and the provision as to payment at twenty-eight was nugatory; and that the clause as to embracing a religious life was a condition repugnant to the former gift, and must be disregarded.—Thompson, Re, Griffith v. Thompson, CH.D. CHITTY, J., 582.

2. Absolute gift—Legacies out of proceeds of sale—Repugnancy.—T. E., by his will, appointed the plaintiff, M. A. K., his sole executrix, and gave her all his tea plantations in Assam and all other his property, and continued: "On any sale by the said M. A. K. of the said tea plantations I will and direct her to pay my brother, J. E., the sum of £1,000 out of the proceeds of such sale. Also the further sum of £500 out of the proceeds of such sale to I. B.," who was the testator's sister.

Held, that no obligation was imposed on the plaintiff to sell the plantations, and that the direction to pay the sums of £1,000 and £500 was repugnant and void.—Elliot, Re, Kelly v. Elliot, CH.D. CHITTY, J., 632.

3. Advances— Hotchpot — Interest chargeable on advances as from period of distribution only.—The testator gave to his sons in succession an option, exercisable after twenty-one, to succeed to his business, the son electing to succeed to be debited with the value thereof; and gave his residuary estate to trustees upon trusts for conversion. The testator empowered his trustees until the period of distribution to apply income of the residuary trust estate for the maintenance, &c., of his children, and directed the surplus income to be accumulated for a term of years; and upon the determination of such term he directed his trustees to stand possessed of the trust estate for his children then living and the issue per stirpes of deceased children. He also empowered his trustees to advance his sons out of capital, any sums so advanced to be taken in part satisfaction of each son's share.

Held, that no interest was chargeable until after the period of distribution (1) in respect of the value of the business against the son who succeeded to it; nor (2) in respect of advances made out of capital to another son (Rigby, L.J., dissenting on the second point).—Dalmeyer, Re, C.A., 375.

4. Annuity charged on income of residue—Provision for annuity—Payment of residue to residuary legatees—Refusal of annuitant to consent—Costs improperly incurred—Liability of solicitor—Ord. 65, r. 11.—Where an annuity is charged upon a residuary estate with a direction that upon the death of the annuitant the residue is to be divided, the court has jurisdiction, in spite of the opposition of the annuitant, to order the residue to be paid to the residuary legatees upon provision being made for the payment of the annuity.

The court, being of opinion that the appeal had been brought, not in the interest of the appellant, but really by the appellant's solicitor for his own purposes, made an order, under ord. 65, r. 11, that the appellant's costs should be disallowed as between the appellant and her solicitor, and that the solicitor should pay the costs which the appellant had been ordered to pay to the respondents.—Harbin v. Masterman, C.A., 421.

5. Construction—Bequest of house and furniture to A.—Power to B. to choose everything he might desire from the furniture.—A testator, by his will, devised to A. a certain house and the furniture therein, except what he otherwise disposed of by will or codicil. By his codicil he empowered B. to choose everything he might desire from the furniture at the said house, except certain specified articles.

Held, that the testator intended B. to take all, or as much as he liked, of the furniture in question, other than the excepted articles, and B. was not bound to leave a substantial portion thereof, Kennedy v. Kennedy, 10 Ha. 438, discussed and distinguished.

Arthur v. Mackinnon, 41 L. T. Rep. 275, 11 Ch. D. 385, approved and followed.—Sharland, Re, Kemp v. Rozey (No. 2), C.A.

6. Construction—Bequest per stirpes or per capita.—A testator bequeathed the income of his property to his wife for life, and after her death equally between his brother and sisters, and "at the decease of either of my before-named brother or sisters, their interest herein to be equally divided amongst their children, and after the decease of all I desire the whole of my property to be sold . . . and to be equally divided between the children of the aforesaid, share and share alike."

The testator's wife survived both the brother and the sisters. Upon her death,

Held (reversing the decision of Stirling, J.), that the proceeds were divisible amongst the children per capita, and not per stirpes, notwithstanding the fact that the division was per stirpes so long as any brother or sister was living.—Stone, Re, Baker v. Stone, C.A., 235.

7. Construction—Gift of income of residue until alienation—Time of vesting.—A testator gave certain property to trustees upon trust after the death of his wife to pay to his son A. during his life so much of the income thereof "as would not, although the same were payable to him, be by his act or default or by operation or process of law so disposed of as to prevent his personal enjoyment thereof, and to apply so much of the income as would, if the same were payable to my said son, be disposed of as last aforesaid for the benefit of" B. and her children, at the discretion of the trustees and in manner thereinafter expressed.

After the death of the testator's widow the trustees' solicitors wrote to A. informing him that they had a sum of money in their hands, the income of the trust fund, payable to him. A. replied asking that the money should be paid to him, but was informed by the same solicitors that the trustees had since been served with a garnishee order nisi attaching the same. B. thereupon served the trustees with notice not to part with the income; but the trustees, the garnishee order having been made absolute, paid it over to the husband's creditors.

On a summons taken out by B. asking for payment to her of the income attached as aforesaid, Held, that, unless A. had by his own act or default or by process or operation of law been deprived of the enjoyment of the income, he was entitled to receive the same the moment it came into the hands of the trustees; that such right could not be affected by subsequent events—e.g., the garnishee order; and that therefore B. never became entitled to the benefit of the discretionary trust.—Sampson, Re, Sampson v. Sampson, CH.D. STIRLING, J., 557.

8. Construction—Gift of "£400 invested in the B. Company"—Gift of "all my money"—Vested and contingent interests.—A testatrix bequeathed "all my money, except the sum of £400 invested in the Belgravian Dairy Co., to" A. and B. She gave "the interest of the money invested in the Belgravian Dairy Co." to C., D., and E. in equal sums for life, and "on their deaths I will that the whole sum invested as above be used for the purpose of erecting an east window in St. Martin's Church, Epsom."

The testatrix died on the 5th of March, 1895, having survived the above-mentioned legatee C., who died on the 26th of December, 1891, after the date of the will.

The testatrix's estate, at the time of her death, consisted of cash, 500 shares of £1 each in the Dairy Co. aforesaid (the value whereof was at that time about 30s. per share), stocks and shares in other companies, and also a one-fourth share in certain railway stock in reversion to which she was contingently entitled on the death of the tenant for life without children.

Held, (1) that the gift of "£400 invested in the Belgravian Dairy Co." was a gift of 400 shares in that company, and not a gift of £400 sterling; (2) that the whole of the income arising from this bequest was payable to D. and E. in equal shares during their joint lives, and to the survivor of them for her life; and (3) that the words "all my money" included not only the residue of the personal property to which the testatrix was entitled in possession, but also the one-fourth share in the railway stock to which she was contingently entitled in reversion.—Buller v. Giberne, CH.D. STIRLING, J.

9. Construction—"Issue living"—Child en ventre sa mère.—A testator by his will gave one moiety of his estate, after the death of his wife, to his daughter K. absolutely in case she had issue living at the death of his wife; but in case she had no issue then living, then a life interest only in such moiety to K. The wife died on the 9th of March, 1895, and on the 10th of March, 1895, K. was confined of a living child.

Held, that K. had issue living at the death of the wife, and therefore took the moiety absolutely.

Dictum of Lord Eldon in Thellusson v. Woodford, 11 Ves. 112, at p. 149, followed.—Burrows, Re, Cleghorn v. Burrows, CH.D. CHITTY, J.

10. Construction—Legacy—General or specific—Uncertainty—Charitable legacy—Gift for the encouragement of yacht racing—Validity of.—A testator who had, at the date of his will and at his death, debentures and shares in company A., and debentures and no shares in company B., gave a legacy of "£500 debenture stock or shares" of the A. company and legacies of "350 ordinary shares," 250 "fully paid shares," and 50 "shares" in the same company. He also gave to his trustees £5,000 "debenture stock or shares" of the A. company, 350 "ordinary shares" in the same company, and £1,500 "debenture stock or shares" of the B. company upon trust to continue the same in their present state of investment, or to sell the same, and to hold the same upon the trusts therein mentioned.

Held, reversing the decision of Kekewich, J., that the gifts included the debentures in both companies, and upon the whole will that the legacies of debentures and shares were specific and not general legacies.

The testator gave a legacy of £2,000 to the Yacht Racing Association of Great Britain upon trust for the purpose of providing out of the annual income thereof a cup, to be given each year, for the encouragement of yacht racing; and the testator declared that if the Yacht Racing Association should cease to exist the trust fund should be made over to the Thames Yacht Club, to be held by them on similar trusts.

Held, affirming the decision of Kekewich, J., that the gift was not a charitable legacy, and was void for perpetuity.—Nottage, Re, Jones v. Palmer, C.A., 22.

11. Construction—Legacy to persons who should have been in testator's employment for more than a specified time.—A testator directed his trustees "to pay to each man who shall have been in my employ over ten years the sum of £10 for each year's service beyond the said ten years."

Held, that a man who had been in the testator's employment for fifteen years, but had left his employment before the date of the will, and was not in his employment at the time of his death, was entitled to a legacy of £50.—Sharland, Re, Kemp v. Rozey, CH.D. NORTH, J.

12. Construction—Marshalling.—A testatrix, to whose will the provisions of the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 73), did not apply, gave to a charity "all the rest and remainder of my personal estate whatsoever and wheresoever situate, save and except such parts thereof as cannot by law be appropriated by will to charitable purposes."

Held, that this did not amount to a direction to marshal, and that the gift, so far as it consisted of things savouring of land, failed, and was divisible among the next of kin.

Edwards v. Hall, 1 W. R. 348, 11 Ha. 1; on appeal, 4 W. R. 111, 6 De G. M. & G. 74, followed.—Somers Cocks, Re, Wegg-Prosser v. Wegg-Prosser, CH.D. KEKEWICH, J., 106.

13. Construction—"Securities held by bank"—Shares—Inscribed stock.—M., by will, gave to a charity "all the securities in my name now held, or which may hereafter be held for me by Lloyds Bank, of 54, St. James's-street, London, S.W." M. was living in India at the time of his death, and the bank then held, on his behalf, besides a number of bonds and debentures and certificates of debenture stock, the certificates for 200 ordinary shares of the Globe Telegraph Trust Co. The testator was also entitled to £3,000 India Three per Cent Stock, and had given the bank a power of attorney to receive the dividends thereon, and to sell the stock. The bank did not hold any certificate or document of title relating to this stock.

Held, that the Globe shares were not securities, and that the India Stock was not in any sense held by the bank, and therefore neither of these passed under the bequest.—Maitland, Re, Chitty v. Maitland, CH.D. NORTH, J.

14. Construction—"Shares"—Debentures.—A testatrix bequeathed her shares in the Grand Trunk Railway to A. absolutely. At the date of her will and at her death she held debenture stock of the Grand Trunk Railway, but she never had any shares.

Held, that the debenture stock passed under the bequest.—Weeding Re, Armstrong v. Wilkin, CH.D. NORTH, J., 556.

15. Construction—Supplying words—Implication.—W. by will gave all his residuary estate to trustees upon trust to pay and divide equally amongst all the children of his deceased father's brothers and sisters, and proceeded: "I desire that the child or children of any one of such brothers and sisters as may be dead shall take his, her, or their deceased parent's share."

Held, that the testator's intention clearly was that the children of the children of his cousins should take their parent's share, and that the words of the residuary gift as they stood, without supplying any words, could be construed as if the word "child" were inserted after the words "any one."—Wroe, Re, Frith v. Wilson, CH.D. NORTH, J.

16. Conversion—Reversionary interest—Discretion of trustees—Intention—Rule in Howe v. Lord Dartmouth.—Where a testator by his will has given his trustees power, if and when they consider it expedient, to sell all or any part of his estate, he has shown an intention that a conversion of his estate (which included a reversionary interest) shall take place at some time which need not be that at which the rule of the court, as laid down in Howe v. Lord Dartmouth, 7 Ves. 137, would make conversion necessary, and the rule of the court has accordingly no application.

In re Sewell, 19 W. R. 220, L. R. 11 Eq. 80, followed.—Pitcairn, Re, Brandreth v. Colvin, CH.D. NORTH, J., 200.

17. Election—Onus of proof.—Primâ facie, the court will construe the words of disposition as applying to an estate which the testator had power to dispose of, if the words of the will, looking at the whole scope of it, will fairly apply to it; and in order to raise a question of election, it must be clearly seen that the words used point to an estate which is not the testator's own, but that of another.

Lord Rancliff v. Parkyns, 6 Dow. 149, discussed.—Minchin v. Gabbett, M.R. (Ir.).

18. Legacy to trustees to plant trees—Benefit of owner of the estate—Payment.—A sum of money was bequeathed by testator, who was tenant for life only of a real estate, on trust to lay out the money in the planting of trees thereon, regard being had, as to the manner and place of planting such trees, to the wishes of the person for the time being entitled to such estate.

Held, that the trust was primarily for the benefit of the owners of the estate, and as the evidence showed that the planting of the trees would not be a benefit or improvement to the estate, that the persons who together constituted the absolute owners of the estate were entitled to the bequest for their own use.—Bowes, Re, Strathmore v. Vane, CH.D. NORTH, J., 441.

19. Power — Appointment — Bequest of personalty upon trusts corresponding with trusts of realty—Alteration by codicil — Effect upon personalty. — A testator by his will, dated in 1862, devised his real estate, subject to certain life interests, upon trust for his brother for life, and after his death upon trust for his brother's four sons in the order named in the will, and their respective heirs male in succession, and he directed that his personal estate should be held upon such trusts as would best correspond with the trusts declared as to the real estate.

By a codicil dated in 1873, after reciting the trusts declared by the will as to the real estate, he directed that his will should be read and construed and should take effect as if there were contained therein, immediately after the limitation upon trust for his brother for life, a limitation upon trust for his brother's four sons successively, and for their issue male in such order as the testator's wife should by deed or will appoint. The testator died in 1881. His wife died in 1894, having by her will, made in 1886, varied the order of the succession of the four sons to the real estate.

Held, that there was only one power of appointment given to the wife, and that it extended to the personalty as well as to the real estate, and that the will of the wife was a valid and effectual exercise of the power, and that the personalty went to the four sons in the same order of succession as the realty.

Martineau v. Briggs (33 L. T. Rep. 283) distinguished.—Liddell v. Liddell, H.L.

20. Remoteness—Share settled on granddaughters of tenant for life—Splitting gift.—A testator gave all his real and residuary personal estate upon trust for his wife for life, and after her death for his niece M. D. for life, and after her death for her husband J. D. for life, and after his death in trust for the daughter or daughters of M. D. who should attain twenty-one or marry under that age, with a proviso that the share of any such daughter should be settled upon her for life, with remainder to her daughters.

M. D. had three children—a son, a daughter who died an infant and unmarried, and the plaintiff, C. M. D., who had attained her age of twenty-one years during the testator's lifetime.

Held, that if M. D. had had a daughter born after the testator's death, the settlement over directed by the proviso would, so far as regarded the share of such after-born daughter, have been void for remoteness; yet the proviso was good as to the interest taken by the plaintiff, C. M. D., the proviso in no way mixing up the shares of the daughters, but operating separately upon each share.—Russell, Re, Dorrell v. Dorrell, C.A., 100.

21. Reversionary interest — "Legal disability" preventing legatee from taking for his own benefit—Bankruptcy, subsequently annulled.—A testator gave the income of his residuary estate to his wife for life, and subject thereto gave a moiety of such estate to his son; but in case the son should at the time of the wife's death be "under any legal disability in consequence whereof he would be hindered in or prevented from taking the same for his own personal and exclusive benefit," then the testator gave the same over to the son's wife and children.

During the widow's lifetime the son, who was one of the executors of the testator, was ordered to pay a sum of £5,188 to the estate, such sum being assets received by the son in the administration of the estate, and his reversionary interest under the will was declared liable to make good such sum The son had also mortgaged his reversionary interest.

On the day of the death of the tenant for life, but before the death, the son was, on his own application, adjudicated bankrupt; but the order of adjudication was shortly afterwards annulled on the ground that it ought never to have been made.

Held, that the words "legal disability" as used in the will indicated a disability imposed by act of law rather than a disability arising simply from the voluntary act of the legatee, and that therefore, on the above facts, no such legal disability arose as would cause the gift over to take effect; further, the bankruptcy, being a mere device on the part of the son, ought not to be regarded.

Decision of Stirling, J., ante, p. 296, affirmed.—Carew v. Carew, C.A., 700.

21*a*. Substitutionary gift — Codicil — Annuity — Land sold subject to incumbrance — Jurisdiction to discharge incumbrance — Future interests — Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 5.—Where land has been sold subject to an incumbrance, the court has jurisdiction, under section 5 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, to discharge such incumbrance, even though in so doing it may be deciding as to future interests therein.

A testator, by his will, gave an annuity of £300 to his granddaughter, to be paid half-yearly, and to be charged upon certain property; and after the death of his granddaughter he directed that the sum of £300 should be raised and paid to her children as she should appoint, and, in default of appointment, to all her children in equal shares. The testator, by a codicil to his will, after reciting that he had given to his granddaughter an annuity of £300, revoked the said annuity, and instead thereof gave and devised to his granddaughter an annuity of £150, to be payable and charged in the same manner and on the same hereditaments as the said annuity of £300 was by his will payable and charged.

Held (Rigby, L.J., dissenting), that the effect of the codicil was to revoke the whole annuity of £300, and to substitute for it an annuity of £150, payable to the granddaughter, her appointees, and children.—Freme, Re, Freme v. Hall, C.A., 164.

22. Tenant for life and remainderman—Capital or income—Apportionment—Interest, rate of.—Sum of money forming part of testator's residuary estate, but not recovered until some time after the residuary estate had become divisible.

Held, that the money so recovered (though it did not include interest) could not be treated as capital only, but that a fair proportion of it should be paid as income to the tenant for life of the residue.

Turner v. Newport, 2 Ph. 14, followed.—Interest, however, to be calculated at 3 per cent. instead of 4 per cent.—Cleveland's (Duke of) Estate, Re, Hay v. Wolmer, CH.D. KEKEWICH, J.

23. Tenant for life and remainderman—Leaseholds—Wasting security—Trustee—Power to raise charge by sale or mortgage or out of rents and profits—Apportionment.—Testator devised and bequeathed freehold and leasehold lands to trustees for a term of 1,000 years upon trust by mortgage or sale, or by and out of the rents and profits, or by any other reasonable means, to pay off a mortgage debt charged on the lands; and, subject to the said trust term, devised the lands to the use of testator's son for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail. Testator died in 1870, and his said son entered into receipt of the rents of the lands and paid the interest on the mortgage debt. No steps were taken by the trustees to pay off the mortgage debt until 1894, when an action was brought by them to administer the testator's estate so far as related to the lands subject to the trusts of the term.

Upon taking the accounts in chambers the remainderman (the infant son of the tenant for life) claimed that the leasehold lands should have been sold on the expiration of a year after the testator's death, and that the tenant for life should account for the rents thereof received by him from that date.

Held, that though the trustees had a discretion as to the mode of raising the mortgage debt, yet the interests of the remainderman—the leaseholds being a wasting security—had been prejudiced by the postponement of the raising of the charge, and that the court should adjust the burden of the charge between the tenant for life and the remainderman according to their interest in the property, and that consequently the tenant for life should contribute in the manner therein specified to the amount of the charge.—Blake v. O'Reilly, M.R. (Ir.).

24. Tenant for life and remainderman—Money lent by testator to a trading firm for a fixed period—Expense of audit of firm's books under provisions of agreement for loan.—The testator advanced money to two persons engaged in business, and it was stipulated that the testator should have no power to call the money in for a fixed term except in certain events, such as the business of the borrowers being carried on at a loss. It was also stipulated that the testator should have the right to inspect and examine the books and stock-in-trade of the firm at any time. The testator died having by his will given his property to certain persons for life with remainders over.

Held, first, that the duty of the trustee of the will was, in the absence of any special circumstances, to have an audit and stocktaking of the firm's business once a year; and, secondly, that the expenses of every such audit and stocktaking ought to be borne by the capital of the estate.—Bennett, Re, Jones v. Bennett, C.A., 419.

25. Tenant for life and remainderman—Onerous and beneficial estates, devise of.—A testator devised various real estates in England to A. for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male. On some of the estates the charges exceeded the rents and profits, and the assignees of the tenant for life desired to give up possession of these estates while retaining the estates which returned a profit.

Held, that the estates being all given in one gift, the onerous estates could not be disclaimed.

Syer v. Gladstone, 34 W. R. 565, 30 Ch. D. 614, commented upon.—Frewen v. Law Life Assurance Co., CH.D. NORTH, J., 682.

26. Tenant for life and remainderman—Policy of insurance—Mortgage—Liability for premiums and mortgage interest—Apportionment of policy moneys.—A testator gave the residue of his estate to trustees on trust for a tenant for life and remaindermen. Such residue consisted in part of a policy of insurance on the life of another person, which policy was subject to a mortgage securing a debt owing by the testator. The trustees paid the premiums and the interest on the mortgage accruing since the death of the testator out of the income of such residue. The person insured having died, and the policy moneys been paid to the trustees,

Held, that, as between the tenant for life and the remaindermen, the former was entitled to be repaid thereout the amount, not only of such premiums, but also of such interest; and that the residue of such moneys should be apportioned according to the rule in In re Chesterfield's (Earl) Trusts, 32 W. R. 361, 24 Ch. D. 643.—Morley, Re, Morley v. Haig, CH. D. KEKEWICH, J., 140.

27. Tenant for life and remainderman—"Property not actually producing income"—Debt due to testator—Realized security insufficient to pay capital—Apportionment.—A testator, after directing his property to be converted and the income to be paid to his wife during widowhood, gave his trustees power to postpone the conversion, and declared that the income produced by his estate previously to conversion should be applied as income under his will. The will then proceeded as follows: "But no property not actually producing income which shall form part of my estate shall be treated as producing income or as entitling any party to the receipt of income."

At the death of the testator there was a debt owing to him, in respect of which the trustees subsequently took from the debtor a mortgage of certain policies of assurance as security. These policies, while the tenant for life remained the testator's widow, were realized and produced a sum insufficient to pay the capital of the debt. There were also arrears of interest due.

Held, reversing the decision of Stirling, J., that the sum realized being, according to the well settled rule of the court, partly capital and partly interest, the widow as tenant for life was entitled to have the sum apportioned between capital and income.—Hubbuck, Re, Hart v. Stone, C.A., 289.

28. Trust for sale—Power to postpone—Business—Time.—A testator gave his residuary real and personal estate (which included a business carried on by the testator) to trustees to sell and convert, and that they "particularly shall with all convenient speed sell" the business aforesaid; the will contained a general power for the trustees to postpone the sale of any part of the testator's real and personal estate for so long as they should think fit.

Held, that this power did not authorize the sale of the business to be postponed for an indefinite time. Under the special circumstances the court authorized the postponement of the sale for two years.
